THE

SATURDAY EVENING POST.

The Oldest Literary and Family Paper in the United States. Founded August 4, A. D. 1821.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the year 1878, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress.

Vol. LVII. | PUBLICATION OFFICE. No. 726 Sansom Street. | PHILADELPHIA, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 16, 1878. | $2.00 a Year in Advance. With Double Premium. | No. 30.

FOR PASTIME.

BY C. FERGUSON.

I.

The roses and the lilies bloomed,
Beneath the apple-trees
The scents of many flow'rs perfumed
The breeze.

The slanting sunlight filled the air
With noon's delicious spell,
And made the mosses golden where
It fell.

The orchard close was cool that day
With green beneath, above,
And just the place for hearts to play
At love.

Ah, sweet, with nothing else to do,
And not an eye to see,
How well the pastime served for you
And me!

II.

But games begun in jest, 'tis said
In words and song in rhymes,
Have unto sterner issues led Sometimes.

And now, though oft the land has bloomed
With birth of Summer hours,
And many a Winter has entombed
Its flow'rs,

Apart throughall the lonely years
My soul remembers yet,
Though you that day, as it appears,
Forget.

But this—however that may be—
I know at least, my love,
No sweeter time can come for me
Or you!

THE NEMESIS OF LOVE.

By Clementine Montagu.

AUTHOR OF "THE COST OF CONQUEST," "JASPER ONSLOW'S WARD," ETC.

CHAPTER X.

COMING BACK TO LIFE.

Mrs. Hepburn looked at her little servant curiously. She was generally particularly bungling in her answers to questions, and interlarded her speech with "Yes, mums," and "if you please, mums," innumerable, but there was a self-possession about her that was puzzling. She went into the room with the doctor, but she failed to see the ring the duke had put upon Hilda's hand. It was gone—had slipped off, maybe, and rolled away.

The Duke of Castletowers drove to the nearest station, feeling very much like a man in a dream, and stared vacantly at his servant, who hinted respectfully that they should only just catch the train they wanted. What did it matter? What did anything matter, if what he had seen was true?

At the station he returned the greetings of the people at him mechanically, and spoke to the station master in such a strange, dreamy way that that gentleman wondered whether his grace could possibly have been drinking at that early hour.

"That's a sad affair, my lord, at Ferndale," he said.

"What affair?"

"That poor young lady that lives there is dead—poisoned herself in mistake, I hear."

"Is it true, then?"

"Quite true, your grace."

"Ah, poor young lady—it is a very sad thing."

He got into the carriage and sat down, his brain clearing now. It was true, and no dream. He would never see Hilda Sforza in this life again, and he was going to begin a new existence five thousand miles away.

"It's a very strange affair, and it frightens me, that it does," Mrs. Caterham said to her son the day after the duke's sudden visit to Castletowers.

She was really frightened and put about. The shock of seeing her master, whom she believed to be far away on his journey, had completely upset her; and now the tidings of Hilda's death, and some subsequent proceedings at Ferndale Hollow—which were, to say the least of it, strange—had completed her bewilderment.

"It is queer, mother; but I suppose it is no business of ours," George Caterham said. "For my part, I don't know but that it's best as it is."

"How best?"

"Why, that poor girl that is gone would have worked mischief is she lived, as sure as I'm standing here. She was in love with the duke."

"Nonsense, she only saw him once."

"It was a case, mother, for all that. Grizzy saw it, and said there would be a bad time for Mrs. Longmore's husband if ever the duke met his wife. It's as well she's dead."

"Poor young thing, it's awful to think of. I'll never forgive that Mrs. Hepburn—never, she knew how fond I was of the poor child, and she wouldn't let me see her."

"You'll never see her now, mother."

"Yes, I will."

"No you won't; she's gone."

"Gone?"

"Yes."

"How? Where?"

"I can't tell you, either. I believe the husband of the lady has taken her away."

Mrs. Caterham stared at her son as though she thought he was going mad.

"Taken her away!" she exclaimed. "Taken away a corpse!"

"So the story goes at the public house. I heard it from a young gentleman in a smock frock, who says that his sister was in service at the Hollow, and that Mrs. Hepburn gave her a quarter's wages, and turned her out of the house."

"Ah, that'll be Lizzie Pierce, the blacksmith's girl! I'll have her up here, George, and see what she knows. I feel somehow as if all was not right. I should like to know the truth."

George Caterham was to the full as anxious as his mother, and he sallied forth to find Lizzie Pierce, without any demur. All the little village outside the park gates was in a whirl of excitement about the strange events at the Hollow. That the pretty lady who had come to live there should be dead, was bad enough, but that she should have been spirited off to be buried elsewhere without any one's knowledge, was very dreadful.

Vague reports of her body having been sold to the doctors, her teeth to the dentists, and her hair to dealers in that article, were already rife, and the price paid, was darkly hinted at by more than one village gossip. Lizzie Pierce seemed disinclined to talk of the affair at all.

"It's too business like of mine," she declared. "I wasn't used badly. I engaged for a month's wages and a month's warning, and Mrs. Hepburn gave me three months and a written character, and told me to refer to Mrs. Caterham at the castle, besides. I shan't do bad, and I shall be no burden at home for a bit."

She could tell nothing, she said. She wasn't in the room when the poor lady died, nor when the doctor looked at her. She thought she was packed off in such a hurry because Mrs. Hepburn didn't want her to see Mrs. Longmore's husband, who was sent for. This was all that she said to the village gossips, but she was not so reticent to Mrs. Caterham. She was very sensible of the honor done her by being permitted to take tea with that lady, and she answered all her questions with, to all appearance, perfect frankness. She had not been allowed to go into her mistress' room after the doctor's visit, but had seen her before. She was quite dead.

It was George Caterham who put the question, prompted by a queer doubt he could not define. Lizzie Pearce looked at him with very wide open eyes, as if astonished at the question.

"Oh, yes, sir, she was dead. The doctor said so, but he said I wasn't to go near her; she wasn't to be touched till the inquest."

"But how can there be an inquest when they have taken her away?"

"I don't know, sir, that was what they said.

"But who took her away?"

"The lady's husband, sir. I never saw him before."

"What was he like?" asked Mrs. Caterham, eagerly, hoping to get a clue to the identity of the mysterious husband of Mrs. Longmore.

"Well, ma'am, I was only watching on the sly like," continued Miss Pearce. "I'd been sent away in the afternoon, but I couldn't help wanting to know what was going on."

"Why?" asked Mrs. Caterham, sharply. "did you suspect anything?"

"Lord, no, ma'am," said the girl, simply, with the same round-eyed stare. "I didn't know what an inquest was, nor how it would come, but I wanted to see that, and the lady's husband, too."

"That girl's a fool," said George Caterham to himself, "a perfect idiot."

But he was never more mistaken in his life. Lizzie Pearce was very wide awake, indeed.

"Then you saw her husband?" Mrs. Caterham asked again. "Tell me what he was like. Had you ever seen him before?"

"I never saw any man about the house but Mr Burgoyne," replied Lizzie, "and he was the landlord, Mrs. Hepburn said."

"Yes, of course. It was not Mr. Burgoyne, then?"

"Not a bit like him, ma'am. It was getting too dark to see anything very well, but he had very fair hair, and a beard that covered his face up pretty nearly. He wore a white hat, and a loose coat and spectacles."

"Who in the world can it be?" Mrs. Caterham said. "And you really saw them take her away, Lizzie?"

"Yes, ma'am, they carried her out between them, and laid her in a carriage, and then Mrs. Hepburn locked the door, and they went off along the Stafford road."

"It is a melancholy affair," the housekeeper said, "and a strange one. What are you going to do now, Lizzie?"

Lizzie replied demurely that she was going to stay at home for a while, and then she should take a fresh service.

"Would you like to come to me?" the old lady asked. "A good many of the servants are leaving, the family not being likely to come back at present, but I shall want a steady girl for my own maid, and I know you did very well at the Hollow."

Lizzie courtesied, and replied that she was very much obliged to Mrs. Caterham, but she knew of a place that would suit her, and would start for it when she had stayed at home for a little.

Asked where the situation was, she replied in the north, more ti an a hundred miles away—she had been recommended to it, and thought she should like the change.

"And I wasn't going to tell them anything," said Miss Pearce, as she walked down the avenue. "My fortune's made if I'm sharp, and keep my eyes open."

She did apparently, and in a very few weeks the village knew her no more. She went to Stafford, and disappeared from thence on her way to her new situation, wherever it might me.

The doctor had nothing more to tell than the servants' girl had. He admitted that it was strange, but shrugged his shoulders, and opined that a man had a right to take away his wife, even if she were dead, if he chose.

"Of course, I should have strongly disapproved if I had been appealed to," he said. "The death was accidental, and there should have been an inquest, but I was not told, and no one can say where the parties have gone to. I can certify to the cause of her death when it is necessary to do so, and they can't well bury her with out it."

"Are you sure of that, doctor? Are you quite sure that there was no foul play?"

"Quite sure, my dear madam, the act was her own, poor girl. I have cautioned her repeatedly against opiates in any form, and she persisted, like a great many people, in taking them to excess, till she has taken one too many."

The telegram that Mrs. Hepburn had sent to Hilda's husband told nothing, and George Caterham took the train to Stafford for his mother what the message had been.

It was addressed to Harry Longmore, Esq., Albany Chambers, Piccadilly, London, and only contained a simple request to that gentleman to come at once, without losing a moment.

Bracy Burgoyne paid the Hollow a visit a few days after his tenants had left, and George Caterham took his wife had gone home, but it never entered into the housekeeper's head to connect him with the removal of Hilda. He called upon her, and heard all she had to say about the matter, and expressed himself very sorry for the fate of his pretty tenant. Her husband was an eccentric man, he said, and had doubtless taken her away to bury her among his own friends. It was a curious proceeding, and ought to be inquired into.

But it was nobody's business, particularly to inquire into it, and Bracy Burgoyne went away again, and the Hollow was shut up, and folks began to forget Hilda Sforza, and to amuse themselves with some new theme of gossip.

Mrs. Caterham never forget her, and now and then would weep for the yellow haired enchantress, whose face shown down from the walls of the west gallery, and bewail her early death; though, had she known it, Hilda Burgoyne was not dead. She was far away from Castletowers, very weak and feeble, recovering from an illness which had left her but the shadow of her former self, but alive still.

The draught had been very nearly fatal, and Mrs. Barbara Hepburn thought with the doctor she as firmly believed her protege to be dead as that she herself was alive.

With the first sign of returning life in Hilda there had flashed into her busy brain a scheme for getting her away, and out of the ken of the Duke of Castletowers, of whose going to India she knew nothing, and her first proceeding had been to dismiss Lizzie Pearce.

The girl took her congé without a word of objection, but with a queer look in her eyes that puzzled Barbara, and departed, only to return afterwards, as she had told Mrs. Caterham, and prowl about the Hollow to find out all she could.

Mrs. Hepburn's next proceeding was to suborn the doctor, as his wife's new honest and his reprieve from certain carking cares of debt might have proved to any one who was curious in the matter. A little disguise on Bracy Burgoyne's part, and a vehicle hired from a distance did the rest, and before there was time for any gossip the party were far away out of the reach of question or remark.

Bracy Burgoyne got his wife away, and took her to a neighborhood where neither of them were known, and when Hilda awoke from her trance she found herself in a strange place, and called by a name she had never heard before.

Mrs. "Trentham" she was called by those about her, and but for the familiar presence of the faithful Barbara at the Hollow she would have fancied the change some strange dream. Her trance had been a long one, and curious things had happened to her while she lay insensible, her hair was all gone, and her hands were almost transparent, and when she tried to lift her head it fell back upon the pillow inertly, as though it were too heavy to be raised.

Barbara told her curtly that she had been very ill, and bade her be still, but her husband came to her and clasped her in his arms with loving words of thankfulness for her restoration, and from him she learned all that had happened. She had never rallied from the effects of the opiate, which she remembered taking perfectly well, and also the sharp pain and weary restlessness and hopelessness which had made her swallow such a dose.

Her first words had been an incoherent babble, and the doctor had given it as his opinion that fever would ensue. He was right. Wild delirium had set in after a period of heavy stupor, and for more than three weeks she had been quite insensible to what was passing around her. She did not much care to live now, she thought, when for the first time she surveyed the wreck of her beauty in the glass.

"I hope there'll soon be an end of it!" she muttered, sullenly, at the sight of her haggard face. "There's nothing left to live for now. Oh, if I had only known—if any one had only lifted a finger to stop me, when I walked out of that hotel in Rome, how different a fate mine would have been!"

CHAPTER XI.

A NEW LIFE.

And often I have heard defended,
Little said is soonest mended.
—George Withers.

Life was far wearier for Mrs. Trentham at Morpeth than ever it had been for Hilda Burgoyne at Ferndale Hollow. She was too weak to feel much interest in any thing, and she would sit for hours listlessly at the window, gazing out into the quiet little street in a way that made Barbara Hepburn fear that the illness had affected her mind. The local doctor, who had been called in, gave it as his opinion that his patient was in a very critical state, and that unless she could be roused in some way she would gradually sink into a decline.

He recommended change, travel, all sorts of thing which just at that moment Bracy Burgoyne could not give his wife. He had straitened himself very seriously in his outlay for her already, and just how his aunt was more than usually exacting and arbitrary. She kept him with her in a fretful, harassing sort of fashion, which nearly drove him mad when he thought of Hilda fretting and pining at home. She was literally wearing herself into her grave, and looked like a person in the last stage of consumption. Her cheeks were hollow and wan, and her eyes blazed with unnatural fire, and she had a cough, which Mrs. Hepburn had caught on purpose through having the window of her sitting-room open in cold weather.

"I'm stifled in these stuffy little rooms," she declared, and, indeed, they were not like the pretty, airy, chambers, redolent of the breath of flowers, at the Hollow.

And every fine day Mrs. Trentham would have the sash raised, though it was only very early spring as yet, and sit gasping out, defiant of cold air and probable danger.

"Well, it can't last long like this," Mrs. Hepburn declared to herself. "She's going as fast as she can, and maybe it's as well. Is she a fairy changeling, I wonder, that she keeps every one in such a state of worry? There'll never be any sort of rest or quiet about her until she's in her grave."

One day, sitting alone, Hilda saw a girl with a veil over her face come straight to the window, and look unceremoniously into the room.

"What do you want?" she asked.

"You, ma'am," was the answer.

And the girl threw back her veil, and disclosed the features of Lizzie Pearce.

Glad of any change, she listlessly bade her come in, and the two were very soon in close conversation. Mrs. Hepburn, coming in from a round of marketing, found the two in close confab, and her charge looking better than she had seen her for a long time.

"How did you find us out?" she asked the girl.

"I saw Mrs. Longmore at the window."

"Mrs. Trentham here, if you please,"

"Oh, it's all the same to me," Miss Pearce responded, "I won't let out anything."

"I hope you won't. What brought you to Morpeth?"

"My own business, Mrs. Hepburn. But I'm in want of a situation, and I thought, maybe, Mrs. Long mere—Trentham, I mean—might——"

"Oh, yes," responded Hilda, eagerly, with more of interest than she had seemed capable of taking in anything lately, "do have Lizzie, Barbara. You want some one I know, and she could wait upon me and help you."

"But I have spoken to a young person," replied Mrs. Hepburn. "She's coming about it this evening."

"Oh, let her go back again, and keep Lizzie. I should like Lizzie better than any one."

Barbara Hepburn looked at Hilda in surprise. At the Hollow she had always been grumbling at Lizzie Pearce, expatiating on her clumsiness, herogliness, and her inability to do anything right, till that young person was wont to declare her life was a burden, and weep dismally among her pots and pans at her young mistress's harshness, and now Hilda seemed ready to embrace her as a sister, and to take leave with all her shortcomings, for her own maid. Barbara could not make it out at all, but she set it down to the whimsical gay and restlessness of illness.

"If Lizzie really wants a place," she said.

And Lizzie assured her that she did.

She gave the most circumstantial account of how she came to be so far away from home.

"Which I should have gone back, ma'am," she said, "if I hadn't seen Mrs. Longmore—that is, Mrs. Trentham, I mean—at the window. You might have knocked me down with a feather, seeing as how people all thinks she's dead."

"You have stumbled upon a secret, Lizzie Pearce," said Barbara Hepburn, "and I am sorry for it."

"You've no call to be sorry, ma'am; I can keep it, too," was the quiet answer.

"Perhaps you will be less likely to leak out if you stay with us. For reasons I cannot explain, it is desirable to allow the Staffordshire people to think Mrs Trentham is dead. If you stay with us, how can I tell you will not be writing home, and telling what you should not?"

All things considered, Mrs. Hepburn determined to keep the girl, the ugh she felt puzzled at her demeanor, and at Hilda's wonderful improvement at the sight of her. It so happened that Barbara was taken very unwell the night of Lizzie Pearce's installation in her fresh duties, and was obliged to go to her own room, leaving her in attendance on her mistress.

The door had hardly closed behind her when Hilda began, with almost breathless eagerness, to question her new attendant.

"Tell me everything," she said, "every word! How he looked—what he said! Oh, you dear, clever creature! Who would have thought you had so much sense in that stupid looking head of yours?"

"I ain't such a fool as I look," Lizzie said, gravely. "I knew there was something as soon as Mrs. Hepburn turned me out of the house. I knew you weren't dead before then."

"How?"

"I heard you groan and sigh when they were looking at you, but I thought I'd better bide quiet and find you afterwards. The gentleman thinks you are dead!"

"The Duke of Castletowers, Lizzie! Say his grace when you talk about him. And he really came to me and cried for me—me, Hilda Sforza, whom he loves!"

"That he does, ma'am, with all his heart, and a beautiful and noble gentleman he is too."

"And he put this ring upon my finger, and I never felt his touch. I wonder it did not call me back to life!"

"He did, ma am. He said it would ease his heart to know that something he had worn was lying in your coffin with you. Poor gentleman! he was in a way about you. He said he had never loved any woman before, and never should again—that his heart would never hold any image but yours, and that he should be the last of his race; an'—and all that," suddenly concluded Lizzie, losing herself in the effort to remember any more of the duke's rhapsodies, which she had reproduced with considerable fidelity for Hilda's benefit.

But once was not enough for the vain, ambitious woman to listen to such words. Over and over again she made the girl tell the story of all that the Duke had said and done, and she touched and caressed the ring with as much tenderness as though it had been a living thing, and could convey her thoughts and feelings to the man who had pressed it on her finger.

"His gift!" she murmured. "A right royal token—a gem such as a king might leave on the hand of the woman he honored with his love! And it shine on my hand, and he who gave it to me can never be aught more to me than the stars which look down upon us from above, and go their way undisturbed by anything which passes in this mortal sphere."

It was a singular jewel—an emerald of great size and purity, encircled with diamonds that were like points of flame in their brilliancy, an heirloom of the Breakspeares, which had never been parted with for many generations. If a Lionel Breakspeare would have given a his life, say thing, to Hilda Sforza in the blind infatuation, and previous storm of love, though they might be, as heirlooms go, nothing in comparison with the love that was wrecking his life.

Lizzie Pearce was not particularly intellectual or moral girl, or she might have wondered at the rhapsodies of a married woman over the gift of a man not her husband; but she was not troubled with any scruples of conscience that money or new dresses would not allay. And she found that she had not miscalculated in fancying that it would be to her interest to see out her old mistress and re-enter her service.

Whatever the charm of her presence might be, it had a effect on Hilda was wonderful. For a the very day of her arrival she seemed to grow better, and Mrs. Hepburn, though puzzled at the alteration, was not a jot less uneasy about her charge. The fear of Hilda's dying while her husband was away grew less as the days went by. She began to gain flesh and strength, and to go out, always with her servant in attendance.

Over and over again, when the two were together alone, she would have the whole story of her supposed death told her, and how Lizzie had schemed and watched, and found out where she was gone, in order that she might follow and tell her.

The ring had not fallen off. The girl had taken it with a cunning presentiment that there would be, as she expressed it, "a row about it."

"And every one thinks I am dead, do they, Lizzie?"

"Every one, ma'am, leastways, there was a gentleman up at the castle that didn't seem to think so. I fancied. He asked me a lot of questions."

"Who was he?"

"Mrs. Caterham's son."

"Oh, he's nobody. He lives ever so far away in Devonshire. I'm not dead, Lizzie, though they think so; and I mean to let them. I'm full of life now. There's something to live for now—something."

If Lizzie Pearce understood these rhapsodies she never let it appear that she did. She listened to them with a stolid "Yes, ma am," or "No, ma'am," as the case might be, and made no sign. Nor did she betray any surprise at the advent of Bracy Burgoyne, and the revelation that he and none other was the husband of her mistress. She merely said, quietly, "I knew it was you, sir, at the time, when he spoke to her about it, and bade her keep the secret till he should give her leave to speak."

"Thank you kindly, sir; and I am always ready to keep a still tongue, and do as I'm bid, when I'm well treated."

And she put away another sovereign to her little hoard, and congratulated herself upon having stumbled upon a good thing in coming to Morpeth. All the news that she sent home was that she had taken a place with a lady and gentleman of the name of Trentham, in Morpeth; that the house was small, as they were not rich, but that her wage were paid punctually, and was very comfortable.

It seemed to Bragy Burgoyne as if the advent of this old servant from the Hollow had been a special interposition of Providence; Hilda was so much changed for the better as far as her health was concerned. In looks she was growing once more like the Hilda Sforza he had known and loved in Rome. Her beauty was coming back, and her hair growing more feathery and golden than ever. In manner she was changed, but he told himself that people do change sometimes in illness. She was graver, cooler, less effusive than she had been at the Hollow. She permitted his caresses, allowed him to sit with he hand in his, and talk sweet, endearing nothings to her as of yore, but she listened to them with dreamy abstraction, as the heart were otherwhere. She did not worry her husband with extravagance now. She seemed to care not about dress, but went about clad in an unobtrusive style, that, had she but known it, enhanced her beauty far more than the costly gems arrayed.

Bracy Burgoyne liked her better. He had found out since that his marriage was a mistake, that he had married a willful, ambitious Hilda Sforza had very little in common, and this new phase of her character suited him better than the former one. He was just beginning to think that there might be a peaceable home life before him after all when his aunt should die, when an event occurred, distasteful enough in itself, but doubly calamitous, since it left Hilda without a duenna, and very much to the consternation of Lizzie Pearce.

Mrs. Hepburn died suddenly after only a few hours of illness, and almost her last words were a half delirious warning to her master against the fate of Eustace Fernleigh, and the evil deeds of Christabel, Duchess of Castletowers.

CHAPTER XII.

KISMET.

To love is a divinity that stamps our ends,
Though by them shaped how we will.
—Shakspeare.

"A waste," as Mrs. Caterham had called it, was the most expressive way of describing the ailment which had come upon Lady Euphemia Breakspeare after the events which had so rudely dashed to pieces her hopes and aspirations regarding Bracy Burgoyne. She puzzled the doctors. She had no organic disease, but she wasted and fell away till she seemed on the very verge of the grave.

She failed a little in Italy, and her brother out in India got better reports of her than he had hoped for, and was more at ease regarding her. But toward Christmas, at about the same time of year that she had left England, a little later, she grew terribly restless and besought Lady Royston to take her back to England.

"I must see Castletowers," she said. "I shall die of the craving, auntie, if you do not take me there."

Lady Royston was always "auntie" with her protege, though there was no real relationship between them. She tried to get at the reason of Lady Euphemia's whim, but the poor invalid could give none, save that the feeling was strong upon her that she was wanted there—as if there were some evil hanging over her brother's house that she could in some way avert.

Her ladyship was the least bit superstitious, and the eagerness and pertinacity of the request frightened her. In her alarm she consulted the doctors, who laughed at her idea, as she expressed it, of there being "anything in it" beyond an invalid's restlessness and wish for change, and counselled her to give way to it and go.

"But the journey," she said, "in her delicate state?"

"Will do her no harm if she is careful. There is nothing the matter with her but unaccountable debility; give way to her whim if you can."

So Mrs. Caterham was apprised that Lady Royston and Lady Euphemia were coming to Castletowers for a little while. There was to be no fuss made any more than was absolutely necessary, as they wished to be perfectly private.

Mrs. Caterham wondered, but was very downcast about it. She took it into her head that her young mistress had a foreshadowing of death upon her, and was coming home to die. Her son and his wife were spending their Christmas holiday with her, as usual, and the ladies would arrive two days before they left.

Lady Euphemia told the housekeeper what she had not confided to Lady Royston, that it was a constantly recurring dream which had made her so anxious to come home—a dream of horror and darkness, and horrible wrong, which somehow she could help to prevent.

"I'm not getting superstitious," she said, "but I can't shake it off. Night after night it has come, and I have waked up, knowing that I was a thousand miles away, and powerless for good or evil."

"You are here now, my lamb," said the old woman, caressing her, "and you won't dream it again, maybe. I don't think much of such things myself, though the bible tells of people being warned in a dream. You're ill and weak, my dear, or such things wouldn't enter your head."

The afternoon after her arrival at Castletowers, Lady Euphemia was sitting in the housekeeper's little parlor—a favorite resort of hers. Lady Royston had gone to

NORA;

NEWS OF INTEREST

"THEY SAY."

"They say" Ah! well, suppose they do,
But can they prove their story true?
Suspicions may arise from sight
But malice, envy, wanton thought,
Will count yourself among the "they"
"Who whisper and chuckle and shake their fun away."

"They say" but who the tale releases,
And help to make the matter worse?
No good can possibly accrue
From telling what may or may not prove untrue;
And is it not a nobler plan
To speak of all the best you can?

"They say" Well, it it should be so,
Who should you to tell the tale or woe?
Will it the before wrong redress,
Or make the injured one happy more?
Will it the erring one reclaim
Henceforth to "go and sin no more?"

"They say" Oh! pause and look within
See how the heart throbs with sin!
Watch, lest in dark temptation's hour
Thou, too, should stand within its power
Pity the frail; weep over their fall,
But speak of good or not at all.

The Miser's Children.

Old Jasper Flint had been stricken with paralysis, and was now lying at the point of death.

So severe had been the shock that he could not lift a finger or articulate a word, though, from his troubled expression, it was very evident that he most earnestly desired to communicate something to his children before he died.

Laura, the eldest, was seventeen, while the other two, Maggie and Thomas, were of the respective ages of thirteen and nine.

For thirty years Jasper Flint had been a dealer in second hand clothing, and although very penurious and tricky, and driving an extensive business in cast-off garments, he professed to be very poor, always crying up poverty to the last.

He had never employed a servant or housekeeper, for the ostensible reason that he was too poor; yet that Laura, from the age of twelve, had been a perfect little family drudge.

Everybody said that old Jasper was a miser, and had stores of money hoarded away; but the old man resolutely denied the soft impeachment, declaring that he had not a penny outside of his stock in trade, that his family expenses had always consumed every penny of his profits, though many undeniable very well how niggardly parsimonious he had ever been in his home, by style of living, oftentimes obliging his family to subsist upon a single meal a day.

However, whatever the old clothier desired to say, he never said it, though he struggled hard, in his helpless way, to make some intelligible sign by which his meaning might be understood.

He died, however, without revealing anything, either by word or sign, and his children followed him with tearless eyes to his last resting place, for they could remember him, young as they were, only as one who had often denied them food when they were hungry, and they knew it was in the house. He was near fifty years of age before he ever thought of marrying, and with his disposition and habits it was wonderful that he ever married at all.

The wife he married was twenty years younger than himself; but he broke her heart by his meanness in ten years' time.

She was a delicate, sensitive and refined woman, and could not adapt herself to his miserly manner of thinking and acting.

She died, as we have said, in ten years after this ill-assorted marriage, leaving three pretty children with a fair prospect of starving after her.

A careful investigation into the old clothier's affairs showed but a few pounds in ready money—scarcely more than enough to defray the funeral expenses; and what rendered matters still worse was, his stock in trade was destroyed by fire three days after, and having been too stingy in his lifetime to pay for an insurance policy, the poor children lost everything, excepting the roof that sheltered them.

But Laura was a resolute, self-reliant young girl, and proved herself, in every respect, equal to the equivocal situation.

They took in washing and ironing.

Maggie, who was stout and healthy, assisted her in her labors, and Thomas, at her suggestion, though he was but nine years old, launched out manfully as a newsboy.

With all hands thus occupied, the miser's children were soon living far more comfortably than they had ever done while their father was alive.

They were enabled to supply themselves with more wholesome food, and in sufficient quantity to appease their hunger, to clothe themselves better, and to appear better and more well-to-do generally.

Laura was very pretty, neat and affable, and thus secured her plenty of work of the lightest and most desirable description, and the young clerks and gentlemen of leisure who chiefly employed her, declared that they could see their faces in their shirt bosoms after they had passed the artistic ordeal of her polishing irons.

She was subject, of course, to a good deal of annoyance from her genteel patrons, in the way of flattery and compliments, but she conducted herself always with the strictest propriety whenever they were present, which soon won from them general respect and friendship.

Her practical little head was too strong to be turned from the praiseworthy current of her purposes by any man's flattery.

But there was one young man who had insensibly won his way into her good graces—a clerk at wages of only a hundred a year—a handsome, beardless boy, high-toned and sensitive, with not the slightest taint of sensualism in his nature.

Although a boy, his love for Laura was no idle passion.

It was deep, strong and abiding, based on a profound respect for her goodness and capability, as well as an exalted admiration of her beautiful face and figure, for Laura, without the aid of paint or adornment, was really, to his enraptured eyes, the most beautiful girl he had ever seen.

Laura, with her practical eye, could read his pure and unselfish nature at a glance, and she liked him in the beginning and that liking gradually developed into a love as strong and enduring as his own.

But they were both poor and struggling so that marriage for the present was out of the question.

Laura was too wise, and had too much regard for her lover's success in life, to wish to over-burden him with her own individual responsibilities, which she felt to be heavy enough.

With the characteristic self-reliance of youth, he was willing to undertake to bear up under anything for her sake.

But she understood better than he, and when he urged she reasoned.

"You are just in the beginning of the struggle," she would say, "and with talent and the good principles you possess, to recommend you, you are sure to rise, if you do not rush blindly into responsibilities that are sure to cramp you in the future."

To these arguments Frederick Allston would always reply—

"Now, Laura darling, this may all appear very rational to you, and might to me, if I did not feel that in your great anxiety for my future success you are apt to underrate my capability of coping with the world. Now, if we were married, I should feel content, and could struggle like a lion to place you in that more exalted position for which you are so well fitted. Certainly I cannot see, taking the most unfavorable view of the case, that our marriage could make either of us a wit worse off than we are at present. It would only be the addition of one mouth, and surely my income would be vastly more than my expenses. Should we ever have any considerable stress upon that important word—'under' your skillful supervision, would add very much to the general comfort of us all. It need not make any difference in your way of living or business. You can go on with your washing and ironing just the same, if you choose to, till my salary is increased, or I get into a business on my own account. You see, my darling, I can calculate for my own fashion, if I am not quite as wise and practical as yourself."

To all this Laura would shake her young head gravely, and maintain her right to differ.

"If everything were sure of being just as you paint it," she would answer, negatively, "the venture might be safe enough, perhaps, but I am endowed with a greater degree of caution than you, and can form a cooler estimate of the after probabilities, in the event of my permitting you to take this uncertain step. Look at Nancy Fulsome. She is only a year older than I, been married a trifle over two years, and has three babies—the first two being twins, and hardly able to toddle alone. Instead of being able to assist Charley, as she did for the first few months after their marriage, she has to have a girl, and is sadlently at that, although she was as trim and neat a girl as you could see before she was married.

"The first year of their marriage they lived in a neat, well-furnished cottage, and they held their heads as high as anybody, and well they might, for Charley's salary was two hundred a year, and is no more now. What has been the result?

"Why they were obliged to give up their neat cottage a year ago, and sell off their best furniture at half the original cost to pay off the heavy expenses attending sickness, and now they occupy three loose, and what makes matters still worse, Charley has become discouraged at his lot, and has lately taken to drink.

"This Mrs. Fulsome told me in confidence, with the tears coursing in her eyes, and she furthermore assured me that she very much feared he would lose his situation in consequence of it.

"Charley Fulsome, when he was married, was strictly temperate, and looking forward to the future with as much hope and confidence as you are, and yet in little more than a year all his prospects in life have been blighted through the united and ill-advised judgment of the thoughtless couple.

"And with these clever arguments Laura would effectually silence her importunate lover for the time being, and send him off subdued, and seemingly resigned.

But for all that, the subject was just as sure to be revived again on each succeeding visit, till the poor fellow at length began to despair of ever gaining her consent.

But that consent was to come sooner than either of them anticipated.

It was a great puzzle to everybody how old Jasper Flint, with his penurious habits, could have died and left his family so destitute.

Some suggested that he must have hidden or buried his money, and every part of the house, cellar and back yard were carefully examined, but without its resulting in any such discovery.

One day Allston was surprised by the appearance of Thomas, bearing a brief and startling message from his darling Laura.

It contained just these words, and they were very suggestive, for they were the first she had ever written him:

"DEAR FRED.—Come to me quick.
LAURA."

Just one brief line, and no more.

Trembling with apprehension, lest something should happen to prevent the dear girl whom he had loved better than his own life he seized his hat and ran out without asking leave of absence from his employer, and rushed off wildly in the direction of the street where Laura lived.

When he arrived she met him at the door, and he noticed that her manner was very strange and excited.

"What is the matter my poor Laura? What has happened?" he exclaimed panting.

"Something very odd has happened!" was her hurried and fluttering answer. "I have just made a strange discovery, and have sent for you to enlighten me!"

She led the way into the house, and went directly to an old bureau and drew out a carefully prepared package of papers, and placed them in her lover's hands.

Fred gazed at them for a moment in bewildered astonishment, and then exclaimed excitedly

"Good Heaven! Laura, what does this mean? They are Government bonds! Where did you get them? There are thousands of pounds, too!"

"Are you sure of that? Can there be no mistake?" demanded Laura, eagerly.

"No mistake in the world, my darling! They are genuine. But where in the name of all that is wonderful did you get them?"

"You remember the old desk with the broken leg, in the room which my father used to occupy? Well, thinking it no longer an object either of utility or ornament, I ordered Thomas to cut it up. In two minutes he came to me bringing a handful of these bonds with him. I guessed from their appearance that they must be valuable, so I sent him directly for you, thinking you might be able, with your knowledge of business, to see into the matter more clearly than I. I was almost sure that such important-looking documents could not be worthless paper."

"No, my sweet Laura, you were right there," cried Fred, gleefully, for he saw that with this unexpected mine of wealth in her possession, she could not reasonably withhold her consent longer to become his bride—not if she really loved him, as she had so often assured him in their tenderer moments. "There is no better paper in the country to-day, or in the world than these same bonds. But have you examined the old desk thoroughly to see if you have secured them all?"

"No. I have not. I was waiting for you."

"Then let us search."

The search resulted in nothing further than the discovery that the old desk contained a false bottom. Thomas had split it open and secured every one of the bonds before making his triumphal entry into the house to astonish his sisters.

Fred and Laura made a careful estimate of the aggregate amount of the bonds, with interest, which had been accruing for nearly two years.

They found that they now represented a figure slightly exceeding forty thousand pounds.

In a world, the miser's children, who had been struggling so hard for the last year and a half for a bare subsistence, while there was an ample provision for them hidden away in the house, now found themselves independent.

And this was what so troubled my father after his attack of paralysis," sighed Laura. "He could neither speak nor write, or in any way make himself indestood. Poor father, he must have suffered terribly, not to be able to reveal his secret for the benefit of his children. But he was very odd, and, when well admitted no one to his confidence.

"As you say, he must have suffered in these again, for it will you not be merciful enough to end this long suspense, and name the happy day?"

"It is now the middle of November," said Laura, archly. "Let us say at Christmas."

"You are a darling angel!" cried Fred, rapturously, and they were married at the appointed time.

Maiden Aunts.

I have been the genuine admirer and the unhappy victim of my maiden aunts. Of these aunts, I retain a lasting affection Aunt Bessie and Aunt Mary stand first on my list.

I am sure neither my school nor college career would have been so smooth without their helpful counsels, and their still more helpful pecuniary assistance.

Many a boyish scrape have they pulled me through when appeals for parental aid would have been worse than useless, and many a the thrashing and exposure I have escaped through the beneficent intervention of these admirable women.

I do not think I exaggerate when I aver that both these dear aunts of mine loved their helpless nephew

TO OUR PATRONS.

The Post has ever striven to be the BEST LITERARY PAPER IN EXISTENCE. It resorts to no falsehoods or artifices to increase its reputation, but depends solely and entirely upon INTRINSIC MERIT. It has no recourse to tricks to enlarge its circulation; it does not depend upon vile wood cuts, illustrating vile stories which are as immoral and morbid as they are immoral and criminal. It has never sown broadcast the seeds of evil in the shape of coarse and low advertisements, vaunting itself and decorating itself with false hands, badly executed and third rate cuts, miserable serials which pander only to the tastes of the lowest of the low, and which tend to bring a cloud of watchfulness over the whole community.

On the other hand, THE SATURDAY EVENING POST is alive and willing and earnest to be led by the wishes, desires and suggestions of its readers, to profit by them and to endeavor to make the paper the most READ, MORE THOROUGHLY AND MORE WORTHY OF EXTENSIVE CIRCULATION IN AMERICA!

The present age of education, culture and refinement demands nice and varied sources of intellectual pleasure. It totally ignores the bald, matter-of-fact, and impure literature, and the lumpy, stupid and commonplace effusions of thought called only to the dullest minds. It demands life, energy, THOROUGHNESS, earnest, humor and originality, or if not the rare originality of true genius, at least its approximate suggestions.

Now all these merits are to be found embodied in the well edited columns of the Post, and our most critical readers have ever endorsed its general excellence, THOROUGH, EARNEST, ENERGETIC, and in every of THE CHARACTERISTICS THAT CONSTITUTE A PAPER.

In all and every of these respects it is finds perhaps

The Saturday Evening Post
PHILADELPHIA
1821 1871
SATURDAY EVENING FEBRUARY 11, 1871

Contents of this Number

The Genesis of Force, by Professor Winchester. Chapters X., XI. and XII.
The Birthright. Chapters I. and II.
Kate; or, Her Confessions to Mary Lee. Part III.
From Home to Exchange. Chapter XXX. XXXI.
Home Culture. Chapter XII. continued. Hints to Girls. Conducting Introduction to Etiquette.
Chatting at a Social Mission in St. Louis Hospital. A thrilling Love episode. IV.
Testimonials. A more than usually unsuspecting female. Mr. Lord Brougham. Unchecked Flow of Genius.
Poetry, by C. D. Deck.
Lucky Mr. Stewart. Fashion Notes. Sparks and Female Chat.
Short Stories.
Scientific and Useful. Notes of Interest. Humorous Reading Cull Papers.
"The Retreat." New Publications.
Prescriptions. Farm and Garden.
Answers to Inquiries. Receipts, Recipes and Remedies and Miscellany.

A FAMILY PAPER.

It is because the SATURDAY EVENING POST is specially, particularly, directly and perfectly suited to the home circle that its merits are so highly appreciated by those who love home circles, home influence and all the attendant joys which centre in a family where good, pure and elevating reading and refining and intellectual literature are patronized.

Mothers and fathers who minister to their children's happiness and comfort, take the Post. They read it for their own good and for the good of their children, knowing well the important fact that its columns always contain fine literary matter, excellent serials and short stories and departments rich in information and entertainment.

The Post is a complete library in itself. It combines and concentrates all the excellences of a complete library within its forty eight columns, and all this at a price which suits the times and which commends every subscription as a most beneficial investment, and the Post therefore deserves the unprefaced celebrity which it has obtained as the family paper for all homes.

THE RIVER CLOUD.

the first instalment of which appears in this number, will be found a most artistic story—as natural as it is effective.

Our Short Stories are most absorbing and effective.

Five Serials are now in the course of publication in the Post.

SERIAL STORIES is really what it professes to be—the lively gossipy chat of the fireside with its readers.

Home or Domestic Intelligence is one of its interest. It is in fact the most complete and thorough collection of famous phrases which has appeared in any paper or work.

WASHINGTON DISPATCHES. Every reader of the Post will respond to a tribute to this truly great man. The 22d of February marks the epoch of the birth of a true hero, a wise statesman and a good man.

ANSWERS TO ALL INQUIRIES. This department of the Post contains a world of information. Although we cannot answer the multitude of inquiries made of us at one, but have to defer many of them until we have space, we assure our correspondents that all communications will certainly be respectfully noticed by the editor.

HOME CULTURE. The author of this fine department of the Post—the like of which has never yet appeared in any paper or periodical—enters deeply and with keen insight, into the philosophy of manners, the actual logic of forms, customs, and all the indices of true civilization, and her work is as beautiful in style as it is instructive, entertaining and useful in matter.

LADIES DEPARTMENT, FASHION NOTES, QUERIES AND FASHION CHAT. It will be worth our readers while to look attentively at this department of the Post, and notice with what tact and taste the Editor contrives to give a perfect epitome of the fashions and what is going on in the great bazaars of the city in respect to silkens. The Female Chat is also worthy of all the interest and attention it is at present receiving.

COMPANIES

We are all bound by the mysterious chain of Sympathy, and we are all more or less of a common and united brotherhood when organization embraces every human being and which does not distinguish as does race, creed or locality. The world thank Heaven is better than it appears to be, despite the predictors and forces of mortal prophecies, and there never yet was a case of true distress, misery, or want of opportunities existing among men but found ample sympathy and hosts of compassionate friends.

The general impulse of humanity is for good or evil, and public opinion recognizes this fact when it responds in sympathy to those who have erred and who have met with only unmerited justice, without mercy. Then it is that the common bond of union between man as brothers is evidenced to the noblest way and sympathetic and all to the unfortunate, are so touched on every side.

SANCTUM CHAT

Bosh. is a Turkish word meaning "Good for nothing." Adam in the same language means a man. Therefore when Mahomedans wish to call a fellow a wump, in words to that effect, they say "Bosh Adam!" It is well to know these things.

For the benefit of fellows who have pumpkin pies, Prof. F. B. Storer of the Bussey Institution, has made a scientific analysis of a pumpkin, and finds that the rind of that gourd is nearly three and a half times as rich in albumen cells as the flesh, and proves that the pumpkin is a very solid thing after all.

They say a tramp ninety eight years old is perambulating Eastern Massachusetts towns. Now they don't say whether he has been ninety eight years in the tramping business or whether he has just taken to the profession. The greatest tramp in mythology is the Wandering Jew, and this old chap must be either that notorious pedestrian or an imitator of his style, passing himself off as Bobtail, in hopes somebody will give him a "red."

The more theatrical in music have of late very little popularity with the masses, for the reason that music, to the great majority of people, is a purely sensual, and not an intellectual delight. The works of Beethoven and Bach appeal to higher natures, and the theory of connoisseurs is of itself a science which requires much study to appreciate, but when once appreciated and mastered it enables one to understand the wonderful harmonies of the masters, and satisfies the soul to a far greater degree than the more sensual music of the Italian and French school.

They say Lord Arlington, whenever he expects a royal visit, puts his female servants in dresses and ribbons to match the colors of the rooms to which they are attached. This may be done on the theory of color concealment resorted to by insects and birds, and which, as Darwin has hinted, is for the purpose of hiding them from their natural enemies. That naturalist says the snake, the wildcat and leopard take the color of dark thickets and interlacing twigs, and moths and butterflies are colored like the flowers they rob of their honey. Lord Arlington may be a friend of this hypothesis.

They rumor is afloat that Joaquin Miller is writing a new play, in which the most startling characters are a number of outlaws. Surely the stage needs novelty, and the idea of Joaquin's is certainly novel and will be sure to have a long run. It might be called "Devoured; or, The Felonious Villian." Will Hume, or How the Lord Hid Them. Long Fly, or, The Lunch Fiend of the Cannibal Isles. It will certainly be a most exciting play. To see a host of masked savages preparing a Barnum repast upon a ship's crew, for example, and dancing a ballet while the cooks are cooking, would be a fascinating entertainment which would throw in the shade all the Black Crook performances and such spectacular shows, and prove to all the sensation of the season.

The attraction of gravitation must have bothered a great many of the ancients before Newton discovered it, and before they knew what was the matter when things went tumbling and rolling about in every conceivable direction, and dropping and playing all kinds of diabolical tricks, just as they do now days when you are seated one of any object you lay upon the table to front of you, for it is always prone to obey this immutable law and fall on the floor into nooses unknown. They say it holds the planets in place in something to that effect, but it also makes gross people waste anathemas to a comfortable extent when it chooses to exert its power. It seems to us it is always stronger in some places than in others and the neighborhood of our editorial table is a favored spot. It drags down paper on the least provocation and the other day it caused our inkstand down upon the floor. We can only assume that it belongs oftimes to a species of psychic force which is closely allied to dislike and it needs exercising occasionally.

The love of flowers is becoming so greatly developed a taste among the Americans as among the French and the Oriental nations. In fact, we are very much like the French, although we have as yet no real art among us in respect to our features for color and symmetry. This love is innate in us because we live in a land of gorgeous atmosphere, than that blue, grand cloud effects, wonderful sunsets and moonlights far surpassing the finest Italian views and a variety of landscape which is not found in any other lands. Jealous of Italian sunsets, it will be observed that the English poet first brought them to the attention of the English the day when America was not so much visited by English tourists as now, and was comparatively a new acquaintance. Of course the great contrast between the dull Northern atmosphere, the smoke and fog of the Thames and the radiant glory of the Italian heavens could not fail to impress the traveler—much less a writer and a poet. Hence the varied glory of the Italian sunsets and moonlights which enrich their romance in fiction and poetry.

Two men who likes our poem is a friend of ours, who his individual caveat to Poe's Raven, and is continually mouthing it. He is a quiet, peaceable, mild to do human, with nothing in the world to worry him, and yet he becomes terribly gloomy when he retires in a dreary room rules over and sees the floor.

"And my soul shall be lifted—
From out that shadow floating on the floor—
Shall be lifted—nevermore!"

He is a well meaning man, but at times in the midst of a game of cards, for instance, he will exclaim:

"Ah, Blackjack! I remember it was in the Black Forest!"

And when we ask him what is trump will reply vaguely:

"Speak the raven, nevermore!"

We fully expect him to measure his bad winks to the rhythm of Poe's sombre cadences and to mutter with his last breath:

"Then nothwithstanding that my grave dreams are filled with an undying sound
Still I pray—pray to God—that he shall not take my soul into the dreadful Hereafter!
Quoth the raven, nevermore!"

Well, if I pitch the trail aside, and then I shuffle, perhaps I may get back home. Keep the memories of Lenore
Quoth the raven, nevermore!
Quoth the raven, nevermore!
Quoth the raven, nevermore!"

The wishing ring, which some old fairy tales tells us about, must have been a fine thing to have. It was a little circle of gold which was worn upon the thumb and which gratified every good wish in music, but in the event of a bad or wicked wish being uttered, or even thought, knocked the owner down by a sort of galvanic shock. A good invention it was, no doubt, yet rather an unpleasant trinket to possess, as the general run of weak mortality goes. A man hardly knew what ailed him when the ring knocked him down. He might commit a score of physicians to no effect whatever as to the cause of the commotion. A fellow noted for his morality, piety and humanitarian ism might have been dining with a bishop in state, and all of a sudden flopped over like a man in a fit, to the great consternation of the guests, who little imagined it was some wicked wish that did it. A matchless invention, when we come to think of it. It appears that nobody in the good old days cared much about keeping the ring, for very obvious reasons, and so it passed from pawnbroker to pawnbroker, having knocked down a score of good people on its way, including a few pawnbrokers, and finally disappeared, much to the relief of the people of the ancient times—who were no better than they ought to have been.

Two book worms is a curious species of human. The French call such a person a bouquiniste. He is ever on the alert to pick up old volumes, not that he loves literature but merely because they are books. The bouquiniste always has a good collection of the odds and ends of printed matter—old tomes in parchment and musty works in shabby cloth, the Electric editions and the attractive books of this century. A book to him is precious simply because it is a book and it becomes a precious treasure in his eyes in proportion to its age or its rarity. We know such a collector who has never read a single volume in his shabby collection, and yet who prides himself upon knowing just what volumes he possesses. He is immensely pleased when a friend drops in and discovers a treasure in a poem of Longfellow or Tennyson or Bonnger. Then the work seems to possess a double charm to him. On one occasion we asked him if he had Robert Browning "on the brain," he replied—"No, the third shelf the fifth book from the right, there is one book there." We found it and turned and turned. We read title—"Christmas Eve and The Bishop orders his tomb in St. Praxed's Church." Nothing could exceed his delight when he heard these poems. He grasped the volume, uttered it with pride and exclaimed: "To think that such poetry is in Browning—why I only paid a quarter for the book!" and he replaced it on the shelf with the air of a man who had chanced upon an El Dorado!

PREPARING FOR SPRING FUN.—Active preparations are going on for the ensuing amusement of that long protracted work of building the Darby Road. A dam twenty feet wide long is to be carried across the gulf and upon this pumping machines are to be erected having 10,000 horse power, and capable of discharging from the overflowed sea a quantity of water equal about to 8,000,000 cubic metres daily. The work is to expected will occupy sixteen years for its completion, and its estimated cost will be something over $10,000,000!

HOME CULTURE.

XXXIII

SELF-TRAINING;

A COMPANION TO THE

"YOUNG LADY'S FRIEND,"

Compiled to Suit Life in America.

BY

MRS. H. O. WARD.

CHAPTER XII. (CONTINUED.)

Then it is one that not only loves them, when not in their presence, but does everything in her power to make them happy, and to bring out the best in them, and to make them feel that she is their friend, and that she is ever ready to help them, and to do them good, and to make them happy

LIVING FOR LOVE.

Two lovers sought a maiden fair,
And each began to woo;
Of equal station, equal wealth,
Equal in person too.
Where rivalry so equal strove
What could the maiden do?

Each promised her eternal truth—
For lovers all are true;
Each pictured worlds of happiness,
And scenes of pleasure new;
Each was the truest and the best—
What could the maiden do?

"I'll die for you," one lover said,
"What further can I do?"
"I'll live for you," the other said
"That was a promise new."
The maiden gently bowed her head
What else could maiden do?

"Tis not so hard to this hard world
To die; then all is past;
The love that's hold enough to live—
That is the love to last.
And you will live for me?" she said
"Well, then, the die is cast."

THE RIVEN CLOUD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "OLD MIDDLETON'S MONEY," "SORA'S LOVE-TEST," "REAPING THE WHIRLWIND," ETC.

CHAPTER I.

The little boys have just started off to school, Dolf carrying the bag of school-books, and Stevie a little parcel of my seed-cake for their luncheon; and I, still standing at the shop door where I always wait for their last nod and smile, feel my eyes fill with tears. Though I sat up so late last night mending their coats, though I brushed their caps so carefully, and though I made their little frayed collars as white as hands could make them, my little brothers still look very, very poor. And I cannot help it. Those who are poor know how impossible it is to look otherwise, even with all care, and will understand how, though I try so hard (and have tried for all the seven years since our mother died), we all still look—what we are—very, very poor.

My little brothers are at the corner of the street now; they turn with their last smile, and in another moment they are out of sight. I go in from the door, and wipe my eyes, and begin to dust the books in the shop, and presently I find myself actually singing over the task; for, after all, poverty is not sickness or death, and indeed singing comes more naturally to me even yet than crying.

I polish the glass case (very carefully, for fear of the cracked panes giving way), and display to the greatest advantage the few little prints and showy articles which we possess. I make the brightest books conspicuous, and put the faded ones into the background. Then I change the places of the prints and periodicals in the window, that the stationer opposite (whose books and pictures are constantly renewed), may imagine that we sometimes replenish our stock. And, while I am busy, the old sad thought lies only half hidden under those passing fancies I try so hard to hold—

"How hard it is to pay our way from day to day! And how long shall we be able to do it? How long, above all, will my dear old father——"

I stifle that thought, and go back to my singing, while I put my duster away in its drawer, and rule and date the day-book. This is Thursday, and only six shillings and sixpence have been taken through the week. I make a rapid mental calculation—rent for house and shop; gas, which must be burned all the evening in the shop whether customers are in or not; coal, taxes, food for six people, three of whom are hungry growing children; clothing for us all, the stock to keep up, the school-bills to meet, and a few poor to help, to whom our mother used to be kind, and whom she begged us never to forget. And against all this six shillings and sixpence taken in in three days!

In the few moments of silence, while my head is still bent over the day-book, and I am vainly trying to feel strong and ready for whatever may happen, some one whose step I know comes into the shop. Yet I do not raise my head; no, not though my heart is beating with a love which, in its great intensity, amounts to pain, because it is a love which has never yet gone hand in hand with hope. Gently, though by hands that are used to work, my head is lifted; then, while my eyes grow hot and troubled under the long gaze that holds them (so tender, so longing, so unutterably sad), a cry escapes my lips involuntarily, for I know now that this is to be our good-bye—Philip's and mine. Still it is long before I can so whisper his name, just to disturb this silence which seems so full of heartache for us both, but for the first time in his life he does not answer me. Then, as I cannot bear that yearning gaze of his any longer, I draw my face away and cover it. And when at last he breaks this miserable silence of his, leaning on the counter with his head in his hands in a weary, spiritless way, I hardly recognize the heavy voice in his.

"Jeanie, my good-bye to me, and let me go."

"Not a last good-by—oh, not a last good-bye!" I falter.

"Why not?" he questions moodily; but, oh, his face is so full of misery—the handsome, honest face that I have seen so happy and content! "Why not? Are these such pleasant interviews that we should multiply them? Is it pleasant for me to come and make your hard life harder by letting you witness (beyond your own) my poverty and my despair?"

"They are my poverty and my despair, too," I say very timidly; "and I cannot bear them without you."

"I want a heart of iron to fight my way from this humiliation," he goes on, still in that unfamiliar tone; "I want to be as you I grow weak and trembling like a woman. I—I will not come again."

"If I thought you meant it Philip," I say with a smile—a real smile, for could I pretend anything in the face of his intense earnestness?—"I would help you to go away. I would even ask you never to come again if I thought I really made you weak. So you shall think it over, and tell me exactly what you think, next time you come."

"Next time!" he echoes, but the unfamiliar bitterness has almost vanished from his tone now, and the old warm, loving look comes back into his eyes as he takes my hand in his, and kisses me.

"Next time, Jeanie! Very well, there shall be one more. I had meant this to be the last. I had meant to put a hundred miles to-day between myself and you, but your own words are always best. And what a respite it seems! There, isn't that cowardly? But, oh, my dear, my dear, how shall I ever bear that parting which is so near?"

"You really think it wiser to go, Philip?" I ask, trying not to let there be any disappointment in my tone.

"It is my only hope," he answers me, covering my hands warmly and closely in his own, just as if to show me how he would hold and protect me if he could. "It is the only chance I have of ever winning you, darling, into my own home, and cherishing you there as you are cherished now in my heart. Dear love, for such an end a man may well work hard and long and uncomplainingly, and I will—I will. You have calls enough upon your courage and your patience, my own love, without my giving you others. And I ought at least to comfort and encourage you, until I can bear the hardness for you, and give you ease and rest at last. Oh, Jeanie, Jeanie, when shall we gain that sweet 'at last' that we have thought of so long, and that seems to get farther from us day by day?"

"But it is really coming nearer to us day by day," I add, trying to look hopefully into Philip's grave, sad eyes. "And we are both young and faithful, and can wait."

"Dear," he whispers, in an unsteady voice, "I seem to have waited so long, and to be no nearer obtaining you to-day than I was two years ago, when I found you first, my child love. Not so near," he goes on brokenly, "for I was full of hope and courage then, and now——"

"And now," I pray, not minding that my eyes are filled with tears, because I can only think of the two years of poverty and disappointment he has borne—and borne in vain—and which have told sadly on his strong young figure, and his dauntless gentle nature—"your child-love is a woman, Philip, and the love she gives you is stronger and truer a hundredfold than it was two years ago."

Then, as he gently takes my face between his hands once more, and kisses it, I see the old, steadfast, patient look come back into his eyes, and I shrink from asking him any questions that may chase it away again. But he does not wait to be asked. He gives me the gloomy tidings tenderly, and tries to make me believe that he is not depressed and sick at heart because another scheme of his has failed.

"It was of no use," he says, "the post was filled an hour before I reached Stafford. Yet the manager seemed pleased too, Jeanie, with the specimen I took."

"Pleased! I should think so," I cry—and I can feel that my pride in him brings a warmer color into my cheeks. "Father says that when he went over the Worcester factories, years ago, he never saw any painting so clever as yours, Philip—none!"

"Perhaps," Philip answers, smiling gently, for he would never doubt my father's judgment, "painting on china has made a great advance since then, Jeanie. The work, in its perfection, is very beautiful now, dear."

"Yours is, Philip."

"Yes, mine is—sometimes," he assents, with a sigh which I see him try to stifle. "But I often get low, like a fool, and out of heart, and then my work is vile. I need no one to tell me this, I can see it myself, and, as I see it so different from my idea, you may guess this hard art is not gain in canning. But sometimes again I am satisfied with my own designs; and—yes, I think they are even as you say, beautiful. If I had only one fair start," he cries, drawing one hand wearily through his hair, "I might——"

"Look the whole world in the face and owe not any man," I put in, trying to bring a smile to his harassed face.

"I might give you—but what is the use to think of an impossible case?" he says unsteadily.

"Not impossible at all, Philip," I contradict. "It is two years sooner than it was when I knew you first, and then you said you should soon be at the top of the profession. Do you forget?"

"Forget!" he echoes, meeting my eyes with just his old smile. "It takes a man more than two years to forget such castles as I built then, my darling. They have fallen about me in ashes, but I can not forget them."

"Now, Philip," I say, trying in a most unnatural way to be cheerful, "tell me what is your next plan?"

"My next plan," he said, in a hard, curt way, "is—America."

"Oh, Philip!"

The cry of sorrow and fear comes from me sorely against my will, and, when I see the change it brings into his face, I understand that it was the strong command he had put upon himself which had made him tell me of this project so coldly and briefly.

"Don't say a word to me, Jeanie—not one word. It is ruin to me to stay here, and—it is you only who can keep me."

But my heart is stronger because I have seen how he suffers, and I feel how unworthy I shall be of his great love if I do not help him in such hours as these.

"If you say it is best for you to go, Philip," I say, as steadily as ever I can, "I shall know it really is best, and I shall—I shall think all day and night of how you will some day come home again to me, and of how happy we shall be—then."

"My dearest," he says, in a strange sort of intense whisper, holding my hands so tightly that he really pains me, "and then, it seems as if the other words he wished to say will not come. So I smile a little—though it all seems strange, as if my lips could never have known how to smile before—and say that he should tell me all the rest next time he comes—next time.

"I had so much to tell you, Jeanie, to explain and soften that resolution I have had to make in my deep despair; and I have said nothing."

"You have told me of the resolution, Philip," I answer, almost steadily. "That is enough for this morning. It will seem different to me when you come next, and we can talk of other things—too. I—I see exactly what you mean, Philip—exactly."

"I do not," he says, in an odd bitter way, as he turns his head suddenly from me. "I would to Heaven I did! When will it all be clear?"

"Very soon," I answer, feeling strangely while I speak thus to Philip, because he has always been so much braver than I have, and there never was a time before this when I have had to speak as if he were impatient or discontented. "Very soon, Philip, and we shall see our future clearly, as you say, we shall see it so bright, and we shall love it so—we two—always together. What will this little separation signify, for all will be right at last? And—oh, my love, I am so faithful in my heart!"

I had not thought what words I was going to say. They came from me like a sob, in my great love and yearning, and in my pity for us both. Very quietly he holds me for a moment, while I feel the quick irregular beating of his heart; then he leaves upon my shaking lips one of his old long gentle kisses, and I am alone, standing with my eyes covered that I may not see him go, for, oh, I am still so cowardly and so unworthy of his great love!

"Jeanie!"

It is father calling, and I run to him into the parlor behind the shop, and take my morning kisses double kiss this morning because it is his birthday. Then I bring up his breakfast from the fire, where I have been keeping it warm ever since Lottie took aunt Charlotte's up to bed to her, nearly half an hour before.

"Now, father dear," I whisper, putting one arm softly round him, when I give him his coffee, and dropping my eyes that they may not rest upon his worn and haggard face, "you must make a good meal, because, you know, however late you stay in the city, you never get yourself any thing there, and you need it so much. And don't stay late to-day, dear." I plead, kissing his thin cheek, still with my eyes turned away. "Promise me you will not stay late. It is better far, dear, to be—to go on as we are, than for you to wear yourself out as you are—as you would do, I'm sure, in your hope of helping us.

"Go on as we are!" he murmurs, echoing my words most sadly. "Jeanie, dear, we cannot go on as we are."

"Then things will get better." I put in, picking specks of dust from his worn coat.

"Or worse," he adds, very low, putting down his knife and fork and looking out into the shop—not into us, but as if through it, into a great vacancy beyond.

"They cannot be worse, father dear," I say, in quite a cheery sort of way. "The very first change that comes must necessarily be a change for the better."

"If I get nothing to do, Jean"—he never calls me "Jean" when he is not sorely troubled—"very soon everything we have must go."

"Why, father, there is no one to take them!" I say, but there comes a great lump into my throat quite suddenly, and a sort of mist before my eyes; for it does not need beautiful and costly things about one to make one's home, but one's home and all within it even with a strong and clinging love.

"But, if I do get employment," my father goes on, while I try in vain to give him the smile I can so plainly see he misses—"and I quite believe I soon shall my dear—we may manage to—to tide over the winter, Jeanie."

"How good that will be, father!" I say, for indeed I feel very thankful to think we may pass the hardest season of all, and begin a fresh year.

"So you see, Jeanie," father says, rising with the very busiest air imaginable, and looking for a moment quite important as he buttons up his thin black coat, "how much depends upon my going into the city, don't you?"

"Yes, father, but you will not walk too far or fast too long?"

No, he will not. He will remember that he is old, and that his children are young enough to tell him, with the dreamy smile which makes his pinched face look a little like what I have seen it in the old days long ago.

I kiss him again, finding no words to answer this, and then we talk of other things, while he eats his breakfast, because I want to tempt him on to take more than he usually does, before his long day's walking and talking, and anxiety and disappointment. I tell him how Jenning's sister (Jenning is the boy who takes down the shop shutters every morning) has a situation in Hammersmith, to which she goes to-night, and how Jenning begged a sheet of note-paper and an envelope to give her as a parting gift, and what a wise present I think it, because it will be sure to come back to him. I tell him that I believe Preston, the chemist, has a new assistant, and that Evans' windows next door look nice and dusty, and show off ours beautifully. Then (in quite the same tone) I tell him that Philip has been into the shop, having had quite ten minutes to say such chat. But I do not tell him of the two new prints in the stationer's opposite, nor—nor of what Philip came to tell me.

"Now, father," I say at last, when he has left the table, and I am putting into paper for him a good slice of my seed-cake, "you will eat this, won't you, as you pass through some unfrequented street? Don't forget it, as you did yesterday, and bring it home unopened. I really shall feel it a personal insult, and shall know you are as hard to please as aunt Charlotte, whom we she can not eat at any rate."

"My dear," he explains anxiously, "I always enjoy it, but I forgot it yesterday. Yes, I will eat it surely, Jeanie. As for the unfrequented streets, dear, why, I know perfectly every nook and cranny in the city where I could peacefully demolish a whole loaf, without any one but myself being aware of the dark deed. Now are you sure you have told me everything you want for the shop?"

I give him a list, scarcely one item is more than the merest trifle, but the memorandum is elaborately copied out and explained to give it an air of importance. Then I brush his hat, and wait at his comforter, and by that time we hear Aunt Charlotte's heavy step, and she meets us, leaning heavily upon Lottie's shoulder.

The taking up of aunt Charlotte's break fast, washing of her, while she eats it, and then assisting her industriously during the protracted performance of dressing, is always Lottie's morning work, while I have the breakfast to prepare, father's coffee to pour out, the shop to dust and arrange. And (fortunately, I think) it very rarely happens that father has not started before aunt Charlotte makes her appearance down stairs, always entering so heavily and so slowly that she leans on Lottie's shoulder, looking as if she hated each fresh day as it comes, and always seeming injured if this gloomy shadow does not reach Lottie's gentle face below her.

But to-day father meets her, as I say, and so turns back, after his cheery greeting to her, to wheel her chair to the fire and place her in it again, "between" she exclaims, in her most fretful tone. "You must have plenty of money to spare. No one who had not his purse full would go backwards and forwards to town as you do day after day."

"My dear, I am going to make the little I have into much," father says, speaking hopefully, as he invariably does to aunt Charlotte when in her dismal, worrying moods.

"Well," she sighs, pushing away the knitting Lottie brings her, "it is only wasting words to tell you what I think about it. You will never see your own improvidence, I'm convinced, until it is too late. But then I am glad to think its consequence will be a more effectual punishment than my warning words."

"And a sharper one, too, Charlotte."

And Charlotte turns her head impatiently away at these gentle words.

"You none of you feel things as I do," she moans, "but how can I expect you should? You do not sit here all day thinking of what might have been. You are not capable of looking far on, and seeing the ruin and poverty that threaten us. You act like babies, and don't seem to know what misery means. You laugh as you could never do if you felt for those who suffer trials like me. You have no consideration for me. You forget that I know how things ought to be with us if right were done."

"I remember Who knows exactly how things ought to be with us, and Who will some day set them right," father whispers so low that I think no one hears him but me, for I always do hear every word he says, whatever I may be doing, because, you see, I have been so long trying to be to him just a little what mother was.

"If turning into fun things that ought to be cried over, would bring us money, aunt Charlotte goes on fretfully, "I would try to do it. And, if laughing would provide any one of us with warm clothes for the winter, I would try to laugh too."

"Do, Charlotte," poor father interposes, with quite a beaming smile, that dies a sudden death next moment. "Do, my dear, and then at any rate we—we shall be—"

"I never," said aunt Charlotte, with a slow, rigid gaze into her poor father's face, "saw anything so ridiculous. Do you, as your pretending to believe we are not hopelessly poor, and need not be utterly depressed. Why, bless me, just tell me what we are, if we are not about the very poorest people in Hackney?"

"I don't know—I don't know what we are—if not," murmurs poor father, the frail gleam of spirit seeming quite dead now.

"And Jean is the worst of you all," aunt Charlotte goes on, for she seldom has one of these fretful attacks without very specially alluding to me. She sings about the house, while I may sit here and break my heart."

Then father pauses a moment, just as he is leaving the room, and lays his gentle hand upon my head.

"Even Jeanie's singing," he says, "does not make us poorer. She has care enough, for we all lean on her young, willing hands. She has need of some brightness—even if she has to make it for herself, as well as for us. God bless her. Let her sing."

CHAPTER II.

Standing just within the shop door, I watch father out of sight, just as I watched the children; then I go back to my breakfast with Lottie, if we can both be spared for it just then. And we can, for aunt Charlotte is too moody and silent now to find employment for either of us. We, too, are unusually quiet this morning, Lotty looking pale and tired enough, though it is so early, and I haunted ceaselessly by the memory that Philip is going away from me.

When our hurried breakfast is over (it is always a brief meal enough, but to-day it is briefer than usual), Lottie helps me to carry the things into the kitchen, then takes her sewing and sits where she can mind the shop, as well as be near enough to Aunt Charlotte to wait upon her, and to talk to her if she should feel inclined to talk. I do not sing this morning, as I go about my household work, but I do quite sure that Lottie guesses this fact, stopping and wondering over it then with a sort of solitary self-pitying little laugh. I am dusting out aunt Charlotte's bed room, and, without exactly knowing why, my thought follows my discovery, I go up to her glass and look at my own face. It is not changed. It looks no older than it did this morning, when I stood plaiting my hair, and romancing with Lottie upon happy impossibilities, while she sat up in bed screwing her courage for the final plunge out into the cold. Yet I never dreamed then of Philip going. Nor will I dream of it now, for, if I do, oh, how heavily the hours will pass! And when father comes——. No not another thought. What a blessing work is! I dare say many a girl's heart is saved from breaking, and her thoughts saved from bitterness by daily tasks that must be done for others.

While the potatoes are steaming, I run up to lay the cloth for dinner; and, finding Lottie has done that for me, I stay a few minutes chatting by aunt Charlotte's chair, before I go down again to broil her chop. It was not an extra large or fine one, but, as father brought it from town yesterday "carefully and circumspectly, and as I have cooked it with the greatest care, it has such an intrinsic value in my eyes that I feel as if aunt Charlotte must surely make some pleasant remark upon it. But she does not. There are plenty of mistakes for Lottie and me and the children, for we are all healthy, and can enjoy a meal of potatoes or bread and cheese most heartily—Lottie especially, because she is growing so fast that she is generally hungry, but indeed father says that I, though I am nearly nineteen (six years older than Lottie) am growing too.

When I have washed up and put everything away after dinner, and changed my frock, it is my turn to mind shop; so I get the waistcoat I am making for father, and stitch at it, helping Lottie the while with her lessons. Poor little Lottie! These lessons of hers are a struggle for both of us, and I am sure she must know as well as I do (though she would recognize it, never) that I am scarcely educated enough myself to help her, and that if it could be possible that father could afford to send her to school, she would soon be a very clever girl, as well as such a very happy one.

"Don't you ever wonder, Jean," she says to me sometimes—but very seldom—"why things should be always hard for us, when they seem to be so smooth for other people? Oh, how it puzzles me when I see girls of my own age going to school so unwillingly while I should think it such a great blessing? Jean what are we to do? No one gives father anything to do—and I don't wonder. Even you don't wonder, Jeanie, though you so persistently pretend you see no change in him, for he gets to look so weak and so—so old, poor father! No one comes into the shop, and of course they never will while everything looks so new and tempting in the other windows in the street. No one wants to lodgings; and we cannot advertise to bring people here. Aunt Charlotte is always groaning and complaining, and making everything far more hard to bear than even it would be. You have hardly had any opportunities yourself, for learning. Poor father gets no time to help either of us. There's no end to our work, Jean—yours and mine."

"I like the work, dear," I answer quietly, "and better times will come."

"Your always saying that doesn't bring them, Jean," Lottie answers in a quick, petulant way so unusual with her and so sad to hear. "How are better times to come? Will the things in the shop get newer and more saleable while we wait for customers? Do the rooms we want to let grow more and more attractive while we pay rent for them to be unoccupied? Will father be more likely to be engaged as he grows older and weaker? Doesn't aunt Charlotte get harder and crosser every day, and don't the boys grow out of all their clothes, wearing everything into holes, and always so hungry?"

"Always hungry and healthy, thank Heaven," I say. "And, though there is nothing we can do just now to lessen our poverty, Lottie, because, though I am old enough to go out and earn money, I can not be spared, still we can make the best of it, dear, and try to make the work pleasant to each other."

Then Lottie has a passionate fit of crying, hiding her face upon my shoulder, where she cannot see my tears, and blames herself cruelly for being fretful, and for—oh, for a hundred things for which she is not really one atom to blame! And she clings to me so lovingly that I begin to wonder whether our love could be so great if our possessions were greater and—it all seems very fair to me. There is an old agreement between us that whenever we rent our two rooms Lottie shall go to an afternoon school, it being impossible to spare her for the whole day while aunt Charlotte is so exacting, and while there is so much to do regardless of her.

"But there will be more to do if we have a lodger," Lottie says, with a momentary qualm.

This idea I will not entertain for a moment. Perhaps we may be so wonderfully fortunate as to meet with a single gentleman who would be away all day. At any rate, it is no harm to assure Lottie and highly probable this is so.

I am very busy all the afternoon over father's waistcoat, because I do so want it to be ready when he comes home. We always try to have a sort of little festival night on his birthday.

Lottie has, after long saving, bought a bottle of sherry for him, and the little boys have clubbed their entire wealth to buy him a tie, over which, and the keeping of it a secret, they have had great pleasure and excitement far beyond its value. So far aunt Charlotte has not apparently remembered the day, and we are not surprised, because she is only his half-sister, and a spiteful one, too, at times.

I fetch her one of the papers from the shop and beg her to read it herself just this once, as I am so anxious to sew. And she takes it and turns it about to look at the date, as if she forgetes I have brought her yesterday's news.

"Ninth of October.—! Is that to-day? Why, bless me, girls, this is your father's birthday! I should think so." I bend down on her knee, and looking from me, at my sewing, to Lottie bending over her copy book. "Dear, dear, he must be fifty-five to-day, and yet I remember the old farm before he was born."

It is so unusual for aunt Charlotte to speak gently to us that in a moment Lottie looks up from her copy and I from my work. Will she tell us something of that old time at home, of which we know so little? At first I think she will; but then quite suddenly she turns her eyes away from us, and fixes them upon the fire, just in her old heavy hopeless way. But I, dreading to see the old stiffness come back, question her softly, as I go on with my sewing.

"You mean when you were all living together, aunt Charlotte, in the Worcestershire farm?"

No answer, and without looking up, I see that Lottie goes back to her writing in despair. But I try again.

"The quarrel had not happened then, had it, aunt Charlotte?"

"How can a person quarrel before he is born?"

"Do you mean," I ask—and I know it to be a very bold question, though a quiet one—"that the man who so wickedly caused the mischief between father and his brother was not born then?"

I can feel aunt Charlotte's eyes upon me, very steady and very penetrating, and I am within an inch of succumbing and letting her silence us by silence, as she has done so many hundreds of times before. But something gives me unusual courage this afternoon, and I frankly and coaxingly meet her gaze, and beg her to tell us of that quarrel.

"There is nothing to tell, child," she says curtly, but not quite in her usual quenching way. "What can be told about a thing that no one ever understood? Nothing ever came between the two brothers till Christian Murray grew so thick with your uncle. I don't know what it was for. What is the use of asking me? Steven—your father—should have roused himself and found out. He would sleep through any mischief you chose to work him, so he deserves it. Why did he stand by, like a log, and see this man weaning his elder brother's heart from him?"

"If my uncle had been true and honorable himself, he never could have been influenced by any one who claimed his younger brother," I say hotly. But aunt Charlotte does not seem to hear me.

"Murray succeeded in everything he tried," she goes on heavily. "He persuaded your uncle to sell the old farm (which he, as eldest son, had power to do) and then go out with him to Australia—then, you see, when your uncle was abundantly supplied with money. And the coldness to his brother grew off, the injustice to him in taking the means of livelihood from him—was never explained. Those are the bare facts, and who can give you more? Men can be so utterly blind at times, that I have sometimes half guessed the lies Murray was telling of him, and the underhand dealings necessary for a villain to establish himself securely between two such good hearted unsuspicious men. But I had determined to do it, and he had the cunning and craft necessary. I suppose a thoroughly unscrupulous man can make lies sound like truth, when he has won a certain hold upon you. This man must, at any rate, have done it, and your father's submissive, unsuspicious nature—as, of course, the knave knew—would ensure his success."

"Was my uncle not an unsuspicious man, too?" I ask, for aunt Charlotte laughs scornfully and harshly.

"Not he. If he had not been as great a liar as his friend he would not have been led by him. He," aunt Charlotte goes on in a little contemptuous way, "was not a baby in the ways of the world like your poor father."

"Father could never have been anything but good and gentle and generous, as he is now." I say, finding it hard to utter these few words steadily, when I think of my father's being left with no future, as it were, only able to fall into certain lines of life, for which he had no talent or fondness, however much he might try to make the best of them, and do his best in them.

"I dare say," returns aunt Charlotte, with ungracious brevity.

"It must have been a very wretched time, aunt Charlotte," I fancy, tempting her on to tell us more.

"Wretched! I should think so!" is her prompt response. "Wretched for us all, but doubly so for Steven. Yet soon after—being just set up here, and having, I declare, nothing certain to depend on—he must go and marry a girl who brought him literally not a farthing, who actually possessed nothing but a small trunk of clothes, and who became sickly enough to be a perpetual expense and trouble to him."

"Anxiety, you mean, aunt Charlotte—never trouble." I correct, in a firm way, that makes Lottie lift her eyes nervously to me. "You cannot use that word if you remember how dearly he loved her!"

"That didn't make up the quarrel," was the pettish reply, "and since then there has been no hope for it. Christian Murray, out in Australia, is using for his own purposes his dupe's money, and using his dupe himself as he chooses, you may be very sure."

"Then uncle Adolphus is not dead?"

"I know nothing" snaps aunt Charlotte, "except that he cannot possibly be more dead to us than he has been for twenty years, while your father has steadily got poorer and poorer. Trust him! What else can you expect from him? He will be a poor man all his life."

We do not argue this question, Lottie and I. It is too sore a one, as aunt Charlotte always puts it. So there falls a silence amongst us while I just wonder (as I think how aunt Charlotte can always so utterly forget that from that very time she has been speaking of, twenty years ago, when she lost her home, too, she has shared father's, never being allowed to think it given in charity to her, and made much of by him always. But soon I turn from that memory to the thought of how intensely happy I know my father was—even in his poverty—with our mother.

"Jeanie!" It is a sudden whisper from Lottie, as she looks eagerly through the shop out into the street, and my eyes follow here.

"Jeanie, it is a customer, I do believe. He first looked into the window, then up at the name over the door, and I am sure he will come in if you only wait a moment. Yes, Jeanie, look—he is coming into the shop."

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

FACETIÆ.

—A ship spar—Sailors fighting.

—Dissolving view—A melting sight.

—A "put up job."—Staying at a hotel.

—"Census returns."—Reviving from a faint.

—"Taking an account of stock"—Stealing certificates.

—The rabbit is a natural coward but in season it always dies game.

—The agriculturist and florist are not necessarily seedy looking men.

—"The Murphy Movement."—Throwing potatoes at a political speaker.

—The Hinches are taking to cricket. Thus we see the Cricket is still on the earth.

—A common plan with some men to turn an old hat into a new one is to go to an evening party and leave early.

—In the railroad of marriage the clergyman is usually the "coupling pin," while the divorce judge is the "brakeman."

—Since the clamor for the "dollar of the daddies" has died out, it is probable that the clamorers, as usual, have fallen back on their "uncles."

—The hardship of a soldier's life cannot be properly appreciated until one gets down to "hard-tack," particularly carpet tack, and tries to live on it.

—Women should remember that the secret of immortal youth is not to get married. It will be observed that the unmarried female never grows any older.

—A thirsty individual excused himself because he had some business at a "dry" goods establishment lower down, and going over entered the sample room by the side door.

—There are two hundred and forty bones in the human body, yet what man lives who has not thought, at least occasionally, a "rib" was still needed to complete his happiness?

—Persons who have been afterwards hanged were remarkable in earlier life for being able to walk up a church aisle with squeaky boots on without getting embarrassed or red in the face.

—There are many sounds so high that they are inaudible, and few people listen to an energetic player on the cymbals or bass drum without wishing the latter's were of the number.

—Many of those paragraphers who have no scruples about stealing the gems of others, wear "paste" diamonds. The honest ones wear the real thing. Everybody knows they can afford it.

—There is no wife who will argue that it is not her duty to help keep the family pot boiling, and what can more conduce to this result than simply getting up in the morning and lighting the fire?

—Strangers very likely have wandered into editorial sanctums under the impression that they were drug stores, but the perfume of the contributed paragraphs put certainly never caused the deception.

—City life is often, after all, healthy. Many a time have we seen young striplings leave the house in the shades of evening who we knew would not return at midnight having meanwhile become "full" grown.

—The man who gets a lump of ice down his back, wonders at what it reminds him of, until he suddenly remembers the girl's nose whom he kissed winter nights at the front gate, after coming home from church.

—That "the wicked stand in slippery places" does not apply to the minister who looks round his parlor and observes the dozens of pairs given him as Christmas and New Year presents by his grateful flock.

—The force of a good many sayings depends upon their application. There are numbers of people to whom "Truth is stranger than fiction," merely by their persistent avoiding the first on all occasions.

—A woman who thinks says that the notoriety given to George Washington for the cherry tree incident, is the result of his being the only one of his sex who ever acknowledged he was in the wrong in anything.

—Men generally must confess with some mortification that they start to keep a diary every new year and soon drop it, but this cannot be justly said of stationers and booksellers. They keep them almost always.

—Many a thoughtful farmer, as he reads of the abolition of future punishment, thinks less of its bearing on religious science, than its probable influence next summer on an increase in the raids on his orchard.

—Nature seldom puts us into any predicament unprovided with the means of extrication. He may be puzzled by the color, but an interested party can always tell water is not gin, by a proper use of his nose.

When your liver is out of order use Dr. Jayne's Sanative Pills, and you will assist the bilious system in regaining a healthy condition, and get rid of many distressing symptoms.

DAWN.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

The star of the morn is whitest,
The heaven of dawn is brightest;
The dew is warm,
And the blossom blown
Wherever there, is dear, delightful.

Hark! I have risen before the
That the spell of the day be over there—
That the flush of my love
May fall from above,
And, mixed with the morn, adore thee.

Dark dreams must now forsake thee,
And the lotus or lily being take thee,
Let the beauty of morn
In thine eyes be born,
And the thought of me awake thee.

Come forth to hear thy praises,
When the waxing wind upraises
Let thy lain be open
With the good of the gem,
And thy foot be kissed by the daisies.

FROM GLOOM TO SUNLIGHT.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "DORA THORNE," "WIFE IN NAME ONLY," "A BRIDE FROM THE SEA," ETC.

CHAPTER XXX.

It was wonderful how the expression of the beautiful face had changed during that quiet interview. She rose with the gayest, sweetest laugh he had ever heard from her lips.

"I am a Woman with a Mission," she said, "and I shall always think of myself with capital letters. Raoul, I cannot be grateful enough to you. When you first entered the house I felt as though Heaven had sent me a friend. If happiness comes to me through following your counsel, how shall I thank you?"

"I shall need no thanks, Hildred," he replied. "You are and have been, ever since I first saw you, the dearest object on earth to me. You are my dear sister, little a wife. I have loved Uric all my life—I could not help loving you."

"Now I am going to practice my first lesson in humility," she said. "Raoul, I wish that you could be in the room when I give my husband the nigmonette."

"That would spoil it all," he replied laughingly, "and he is so quick, so keen, he would find out at once that the little scene had been arranged between us."

"Then I must content all by myself, I suppose," said Lady Caraven. "I feel so shy as—I cannot tell you what. Raoul, if he is cross or contemptuous I shall lose heart."

"No, you will not. Having once put your hand to the plough, you will not turn back. When your hope or your courage fails you, say to yourself, 'I have to win my husband's heart—that will give you all your courage again.'"

She walked slowly down the path, Sir Raoul by her side. She looked round on the four high ivied walls.

"I have always loved this little pleasance," she said. "I shall love it better than ever now. It will seem almost like a church to me."

"Why like a church?" he asked with some amusement.

"Because one of the best sermons I have ever heard preached has been preached to me here," she replied. "I have learned a lesson here. I shall never see these high ivied walls or touch a crimson carnation without thinking of you, Raoul, and all that you have said."

Then he watched her as she went from one bed of nigmonette to another, looking eagerly for the choicest sprays, holding them up to him with wistful eager face and sweet pathetic eyes.

"Will this do, and this?" she asked as simply as a child. "Oh, Raoul, I hope he will not be angry—I hope he will be pleased! I shall tell you how I get on. I am nervous about it."

In another minute the beautiful face had disappeared, and Sir Raoul was left in the pleasance alone.

"A man might lay down his life for such a woman as that," he said, with what was almost a sigh.

* * * * * *

Lord Caraven stood in the billiard room at Havensmere, he had been playing with one of his friends, who, having received a telegram, had gone to answer it. He stood alone, leaning carelessly against the open verandah, something more than his usual indifference darkening his face, he never liked interruptions during a game.

"A most unpropitious moment," thought the young Countess, as she caught sight of him; but, having given her word to Sir Raoul, she would keep her word up to the mouth of a loaded cannon rather than have broken it.

Looking up, the Earl could not but confess that he had seldom seen a lovelier picture than his young wife at that moment presented, with a flush on her face, and her hands filled with sprays of fragrant nigmonette.

She would not reveal her hesitation, but went straight to him, smiling as that he little guessed how her heart beat. He raised his eyebrows as she drew nearer to him. What was going to happen? Before he had time to speak his face was buried in a soft, dewy mass of fragrant nigmonette.

"There!" said a laughing voice. "You said this morning that this was your favorite flower. I have been looking for the most fragrant sprays of it that I could find."

He could not believe the evidence of his senses; it was incredible that the laughing voice belonged to his cold proud wife—the girl who had swept impetuously from the room when he was last at home. He looked at her in amazement. She would not see the surprise on his face or make the least difference because of it.

"You have the very pick of the garden here," she said, "every spray has its own special beauty."

He roused himself, and tried to recover from the wondering stupor that had overcome him.

"You really remembered, Hildred, what I said!" he began, with a pleased look.

"Yes, and I think you showed good taste," she replied. "I know no flower lovelier than fragrant nigmonette."

"And you really think that I have good taste?" he said.

"Yes. Why should that surprise you?" she asked, with a smile.

His face flushed and his eyes drooped.

"I fancied," he said hurriedly, "that you considered me altogether graceless and without one redeeming quality."

"Indeed I do not," she replied earnestly, thinking of all that Sir Raoul had said in his favor. "That is a grand mistake of yours."

"There is one thing," he confessed, in a low voice—"I have shown the worst side of my character to you."

She felt frightened and inclined to run away.

"You will not lose my flowers or throw them away?" she said. And then she was startled, for his handsome indolent eyes were looking into hers with a new expression in their blue depths.

Am I so wanting in chivalry and gallantry, Hildred?" he asked her. "I believe this is the first thing that you have ever given me of your own free will, is it not?"

"No," she replied quickly. "It is not."

"Ah, pardon me," he said, with a quick change of face and voice, "you gave me your fortune."

There was a bad rebellion for one moment—but—bitter rebellion. Then she remembered Sir Raoul's words. It was for her husband's good. She trampled down the hot impulse of angry pride—she stilled the bitter anger and contempt. Her victory over herself was so great that she was even surprised at it. She laid her hand on his arm.

"Nay, Lord Caraven," she said gently, "you are quite wrong. I was not thinking of money at all, I was thinking of despair—I could almost hate it for the mischief that it makes. I was thinking of something very different from money—something that money could not buy."

He was looking at her with keen intensity.

"Something that money could not buy," he repeated. "I believe that you people me. I thought gold was omnipotent."

"I do not think so—I do not like it. Omnipotent! Why, Lord Caraven, all the wealth of the world could not buy happiness or love."

"No," he said quietly, "it could not; yet, Hildred, money has done something for me."

"I do not intend to depreciate it," she remarked, "but it is not omnipotent and there are many things in this world of far higher value than money."

"It is true," he said thoughtfully.

She laughed aloud, and if he had known her better, he would have detected tears in the sound of that laugh.

"We are positively agreeing, Lord Caraven," she said.

He was looking at her with intense curiosity in his face.

"Hildred, what have you given me that money could not buy?" he asked.

The dark eyes glanced softly.

"I will not tell you, Lord Caraven," she answered.

"But I must know. You have excited my curiosity—you must gratify it. You have enumerated three things that money cannot buy—happiness, virtue, love. Is the name of these. Then what could it be?"

"I must go, Lord Caraven," she said, her face growing hot and her heart beating quickly. "If you weigh every word that I say, I shall have to be very careful."

"Hildred, tell me what you mean," he requested. "What have you given me?"

"I will tell you," she replied laughingly, "when you have counted all those tiny leaves on the nigmonette."

She turned to go, but he put out his hand to detain her. She eluded him, and, with a light laugh, disappeared, leaving him by the verandah alone.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"You look astonished at some thing," said Lord Caraven's friend to him who n he returned to resume their game at billiards.

"Yes," replied the Earl—"I have been enjoying a novel sensation."

"What is that?" asked his friend.

"I am not quite sure," was the laughing reply—"I should not like to be too certain of it—but I believe that I have been flirting with my own wife."

The young Countess had hastened smilingly away after presenting him with the sprays of nigmonette. If that was the result of a few kind words, she said to herself that she would often say them. Sir Raoul saw her smiling and blushing, with a glad light in her eyes.

"Well," he said, "what success, Hildred?"

"The best in the world," she replied, and her pleasure was increased at dinner time when she saw that Lord Caraven wore some of the nigmonette in his button-hole.

She had tried hard to keep strict watch and guard over herself. When she found herself relapsing into her old Arabian and proud silence, she reminded herself. She who had always passed by her husband with lofty unconcern, who had never deigned to make the least reply to any remark of his, she had studied little speeches that she could make to him, she asked his opinion, she smiled at his jests. People looked at each other in quiet wonder. Had they, after all, made any mistake about their host and hostess?

Lord Caraven was fond of music, he had a rich, ringing tenor voice which as a rule he was too indolent to use. He would troll out a verse of a love ditty, or the chorus of a drinking song, in a fashion that made one long to hear the rest. In the evening Sir Raoul asked him to sing.

"It is too much trouble," said the hand some Earl. "Why should I exert myself to sing when other people can do it so much better for me?"

"That is an idle excuse," returned Sir Raoul. "Lady Caraven, persuade your husband to sing, he has a voice almost as rich and clear as Mario's, but he will never use it."

She came over to him. He looked at his beautiful young wife in all the shimmer of satin and gleam of pearls, he gazed earnestly into the beautiful face.

"Do sing, Lord Caraven," she said. "You owe me something for my flowers this morning."

"Do you really wish me to sing, Hildred?" he asked.

"I do indeed," she answered.

"Then you shall be obeyed. Will you have an old fashioned English ballad, or a Scotch one? No French or Italian for me. I like good hearty words."

He sang one of the prettiest English songs— Good bye, sweetheart, good bye" sang it with such sweetness, such pathos, that his listeners were almost moved to tears.

"I could not leave thee, though I said,
Good bye, sweetheart, good bye."

As the last words passed his lips he caught a glimpse of his wife's face. What did it express? He stopped suddenly. Sir Raoul rallied him, begging of him to finish.

"Let us have the last verse," said he, but the Earl turned quickly to him.

"Not another word, Raoul," he answered. "I can sing no more. I have seen a ghost."

"A ghost!" cried Sir Raoul. "The ghost of what?"

"I am not quite sure," replied the Earl, "but I think it was the ghost of what might have been." And Sir Raoul said no more.

* * * * * *

Guests and friends began to ask themselves could they be mistaken—could they have misunderstood? The cold gloom was leaving the young wife's face, the husband ceased his covert sneers and hard words, the two exchanged laughing looks and smiles. If ever by chance she for one moment forgot her role, he forgot his, if by any chance she relapsed into her cold, frozen manner, he changed as though by magic. She saw plainly enough now that all depended on herself.

She studied how to please him. For instance, there was nothing that pleased Lord Caraven more than finding his newspaper cut and aired for him to read in the morning; he disliked having to cut it himself or to air it. She had always been lofftily indifferent, thinking to herself that his indolence must not even be encouraged. Now she thought differently, the newspaper was cut and aired and laid ready for him.

"Hildred," he said, "is it to you that I am indebted every morning for my cut newspaper?"

"It is a great pleasure to get it ready for you," she replied with a charming smile.

He was deeply touched by this simple act of attention. After all there was something very amiable about the money lender's daughter.

From that day Lord Caraven never opened his newspaper without a kindly thought for his wife.

It was perhaps but a small beginning, this changing of scenes, little smiles, but it was sunshine to poor Hildred. Her husband with were alike—in her report, they had a keen sense of humor. The Earl had more of this sense than his young wife, and it was a powerful bond of union between them. There were times when there were no need for words, when a glance was quite sufficient, and Lord Caraven began to look into the beautiful dark eyes for the sweet sympathy that no one else gave him. He began to feel as he had never even thought of before—that he could love. If time hung heavily on his hands, if he tired of billiards, or there was no one at hand to play with him, it came to him with a sense of relief that he could go and chat with Hildred.

She grew accustomed to see him looking at her from the door of her room with an air of apology on his handsome face.

"May I come in for half an hour Hildred?" he would ask, and then she would put away her books, or her easel, or what ever she was engaged upon, and devote herself to him. If he were told some merry story, her quick laughing sympathy was the first thing he sought. If he heard any clever repartee or play upon words, the first thing he thought of was to repeat it to Hildred.

All this was so much gained—yet it seemed but very little. Sir Raoul asked her one morning how she was progressing. She turned her beautiful face to him and it seemed to him there was a tired look upon it.

"I can hardly tell you, Raoul," she replied. "I have done my best. I have thought of him and studied him, and it seemed that I can say is that he has learned to amuse rate with me all his amusements. That is not a very high or elevated state of things, is it?"

"I term it beginning at the very foundation, Hildred," he answered, looking at the wistful face. "If he commences by associating with you in amusements, he will end by making you share in all that interests him."

The dark eyes brightened.

"I think," said Sir Raoul, "that you have made wonderful progress. All the coldness and constraint, the terrible distance between you that made every one uncomfortable, has disappeared. Your husband's face brightens now when you enter a room, when you leave it, he watches you regretfully. You have gained much, Hildred. It is a long struggle, this battle for a man's heart, but you will win in the end."

"Still," she remarked, half wearily, "I am a long way from the grand purpose I have in view. There is nothing heroic in being able to make your husband laugh, in sympathizing with a comical story, in helping to amuse him so that the time may pass more quickly."

"Yes," opposed Sir Raoul, "there is something heroic in it. It is the first step. When you have thoroughly identified yourself with his amusements, you can begin to influence. Uric for better things. Try to make him share his indolence, try to make him share his amusements and take greater interest in his duties. Rouse his soul from its long sleep, and the awakening will soon follow. I am quite certain that his faults are rather those of training and education than of nature."

It was easy to counsel all this, but how was it to be done? Perhaps, if she began to him would call "preaching" to him. Uric would grow angry, and then lost, angry and bitter words might follow. Her undertaking would require infinite grace, infinite tact—and that, she said to herself, it should have.

The evening of that same day was a lovely one, fine, warm and brilliant the sun seemed unwilling to set the flowers unwilling to sleep. It was so warm and beautiful that the whole party of guests declared it was almost treason to remain in doors.

Hildred looked up with laughing eyes at her husband.

"You are going to sentimentalize amongst the flowers, Lord Caraven, I suppose? I hope you will choose a pleasant companion."

It was not in human nature—at least in man's nature—to resist the fire of those dark eyes.

"Will you accompany me?" he replied. "I shall be sure then of a nice companion."

"Is there anyone in my room you would like better?" she asked coquettishly.

"None in my humor there is not," said the Earl hastily. "you are the most amusing companion I can find here."

"I am grateful for small favors," returned Hildred.

So they walked together through the long winding paths. He did not offer her his arm, nor did she seem to notice it. They laughed, talked, jested, but between them there was none of the familiarity which should be between husband and wife. Once her dress caught amongst the tangled branches of a rose tree that had overgrown its limits, and the Earl stooped down to remove it. His wife drew herself quickly away—so quickly that the jewels she wore seemed to quiver in the light. Her face flushed hotly.

"Thank you," she said briefly.

The Earl looked at her in comic surprise.

"What are you blushing for, Hildred? What is the matter? What have I done?"

"Nothing," she replied briefly—"these narrow paths are so very awkward."

"Then we will go into the broader ones. But, Hildred, pray do not waste all that lovely color in a blush for nothing. I know people who would give a small fortune for such a bloom."

"They are welcome to it," said the young Countess.

"I do not say so. Upon my word it is a revelation. I did not think that in these degenerate days any one could blush after that fashion."

She was half inclined to be angry, the remembrance of Sir Raoul's words alone checked her. She must be more patient, she told herself, yet more rigidly she must control her own passions, with its hot rebellions, its sudden risings of anger. The flush faded from her face—she turned to him with a smile.

"I ought to be gratified that you value my blushes so highly," she said, and she saw that he was pleased.

More than one strange thought came to her as she walked by his side. How strange it was, this law of Providence and of nature that men should be superior, that women must watch their faces, hoard their tempers, pave the way, as it were, for them through life, yet always be accounted an inferior. Why was it, she wondered, that the fanns of nature, between generally excused on account of their sex? Men will be men, boys will be boys," seemed to be a universal axiom. Why should she walk by this man's side, studying his humors and fancies, watching his face to see that it did not cloud over, trying hard to be bright and brilliant fancy he amused him? Only because she was a woman. She was his wife, therefore she had to win him.

"What are you thinking about so intently, Hildred?" asked Lord Caraven. He looked at him brightly.

"I was not so. I was thinking about you. You have a keen eye for all natural beauties, Lord Caraven, I have mind that it is not so observed by indolence would be affront."

He glanced at her again, something of amusement struggling with his impatience, vituperated by indolence. Hildred! That is a strong expression."

"It is strong, but it is true. See how you admire the flowers, see how you admire one of its beautiful details. Who escapes you—the color of the skies, the hue of the flowers, the glimmering sunlight as it falls over the trees? I will tell you of a sight more beautiful still—that is sunrise. Why do you never see that?"

"See the sun rise!" he cried. "I have not even thought of such a thing for years."

"Suppose you do so now," she suggested. "I always think the fairest, freshest, sweetest hours of the day are the early morning hours, you who seldom rise until noon can hardly imagine what they are like."

He looked half-doubtfully at her, as though wondering whether she was attempting to lecture him, but she met his look with clear, laughing eyes.

"I challenge you," he said, "to rise every morning this week—not to see the day dawn, but to enjoy the first freshness of the fair morning air."

"I accept the challenge," he replied; "you shall see that I am capable of making an effort when I choose."

She thought that was enough for once, and she waited with some curiosity to see the results of her endeavor. He was down the next morning when she took her seat at the breakfast table, looking better than she had seen him look for some time.

"I have made the effort," he said.

"Did it cost you much?" asked the young Countess.

"I felt as though might were turned into day, or something of that kind. Seriously, Hildred, I thank you for calling my attention to the fact that I waste hours every morning in perfect idleness. I mean to cure myself of the habit; such waste shall not occur again."

It was another victory, but a small one. Yet, as she said to herself, all these, small as they were, would gradually amount to one worth winning in time.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

FEMININITIES.

Gail Hamilton announces herself opposed to woman's suffrage.

J. Grey Swisshelm says the Vassar College girls are "principally fools."

He who loves a lady's complexion, form, and features, loves not her true self, but her soul's old clothes.

A Parisian definition of a beautiful woman—the paradise of the eye and the purgatory of the purse.

The disappointment of women to keep post offices has had one good effect. Married men do not write so many letters to girls.

These young ladies at fairs who sell five cent pin cushions for three dollars ought to be arrested for robbing the males.

To kiss a woman smiles at an affront, one or two things is certain. She has either lost modesty, or she is assured of her revenge.

New England maidens of business like habits back encouraging sentiments like this over the parlor door: "Loafing is not loving."

If you wish to cure a scolding wife, never fail to laugh at her with all your might until she ceases—then kiss her. Sure cure.

A lady being asked to join a union of "the Daughters of Temperance," replied, "It is unnecessary, as I intend to join one of the sons soon." Sensible lady that.

When Jemima went to school she was asked why she was "bachelor" was singular!—"Because, she replied, "it is so very singular that they don't get married."

Old Mrs. Pritchard, of Newport, says that when she was a girl a man could drive three yoke of oxen with less fuss than one of em makes in putting the shoes on a baby now a days.

We are curious to know how many feet in female aesthetic dress go to a mile, because we never met with a lady yet whose boots were not, to say the very least, a mile too big for her.

A young lady of Williams, Iowa, wishing to picture a young gentleman his ring, attached a tag with his name thereon, and dropped it in the post office. On the back of the tag was written, "I hate to but I must."

Amo-ican ladies, in the best society, spend from five to ten times as much as English ladies of corresponding social grade. On the other hand an English gentleman spends twice as much as an American on his own apparel.

Scientists have so far failed to discover why it is that a woman is never so happy as when she stands at the window during the shower, watching her husband trying to get the rain barred under the spout, and taking upon herself to boss the job.

When a man is in love with one woman is a family, it is astonishing how fond he becomes of every one connected with it. He beats time when the darling little Fanny performs her piece on the piano, and smiles when wicked little Bobby upsets the coffee on his shirt.

The mastery of a pure mind over human prejudices and passions is never so well exemplified as in the play of contending emotions that swept over the face of a young lady at church, when she looks on the same form back with a man who has been eating onions.

BOOK OF ORIGINS.

ORIGIN OF PHRASES—THE ETYMOLOGY OF WORDS—REMARKABLE OLD SAYINGS—QUAINT EXPRESSIONS PECULIAR TO ALL AGES AND NATIONS.

BY JAMES REDE.

"In primus nemitis est progeris
Vert inquisitio atque in ineligantia."

"The searching out and thoroughly to search for the sake of truth, is the first, the primary study of man."

T.

(CONTINUED.)

TARGE—TARGET—TARGUE.

The origin of Tarpeia is as old as the year 1000 Before that time the place of public execution was the Roman Rock. Old writers say that the etymology of the word Tarpeia will have it proceeds from the word tye and tarpeo, to tie, to bind, to fasten, to cut, cutting captives at the Tarpeian Rock. Tarpeia took its name from a Roman chief, or leader, who, betraying Rome, and called to the Romans Tarpeia, was slain by the Sabines, and in like origin from whence it proceeds, we know not, but are of the opinion it is Latin.

The late place of execution, according to Fitzstephen, was called in the time of Edward First, where the gentle Mortimer Isabelled his fair Queen, but the only target as well as the present name, was Tyburne, not from the end burn, as if it were called so from the manner of capital punishment, but from Tyburn, the name of a tree, a brook, and Tye, the name of that brook, pound, gave name to a manor before the conquest.

V.

VALENTINE'S DAY.

Twas on the morn of Valentine, when birds begin to prate,
Dame Partlet to a cock crowing mails and men did each betake a mate.
Tiber, and Tyne, and Ree, and Dell and Ard Kelt, who was a charming girl to carry the wedding card.
And song, collated "Dame Durden."—Shakespeare.

Valentine was a pope or bishop of Rome, who lived in the ninth century, and on this day established an annual custom of the poorer virgins of Rome, presents by lots to the commended year, and these presents or benefactors were called Valentines. After he died he was canonized for a saint, and his feast day kept on the anniversary day of February, which was thought to be his birthday. He was beheaded under Claudius II., A.D. 271. Ben Jonson, in his Memoirs and Account of the Poets, says that Valentine died 40 days after his conversion to christianity, being chased to death by a Sub Jonse."

We are inclined to think this is an error, as we have it recorded in the Spectator, Saturday that "St. Valentine was a priest of Rome who, after enduring a cruel imprisonment, was beaten with clubs, and then beheaded by Claudius."

The custom of choosing Valentines is of long standing, and as early as the fifteenth century it was practiced in England.

The custom in Britain evidently appears to have been adopted by the laity from the clergy, in the days of popery, and in a very ancient custom, being of almost a thousand years' standing. The birds, too, are supposed to choose their mates, and pair on this day, which, no doubt, is an additional reason to our youth of both sexes who are approaching maturity, to write their verses, and with much ingenuity pry scissors, pen and pencil, in honor of their selected or allotted lovers.

Like many other observances, it is no more than an analogy to a custom that prevailed when Paganism flourished.

At the festival of the Roman Lupercalia, amidst other ceremonies it was usual to put the names of a number of young women into a box, from which they were drawn by the men, as chance directed. The pastors of the early Christian church, who endeavored to eradicate the vestiges of pagan superstition, substituted the names of particular saints in lieu of the women, and as the festival of the Lupercalia used to take place about the middle of February, they made St. Valentine's day for celebrating the new feast.

Many antiquaries have endeavored in vain to unravel the origin and mystery of Valentine Day, but notwithstanding their efforts been in vain; if discovered, it would likely enough be as unmeaning as the source from whence the origin of our old customs have sprung, and not worth the labor which our ancestors were pretty clear observers of nature, and there is but little doubt that, as they noted the birds, the pair begin to pair and build at this period, when love begins to operate, so natural an occurrence might lead to festive and maidens imitating the custom by selecting lovers, glad of any amusement after the dark and winter had passed, and that Valentine Day had no other origin. As far back as we have been enabled to trace this love making day, we find it linked with the mating of birds, which seems inseparable from St. Valentine, and we are at a loss to imagine how the worthy bishop, whose name is associated with it, first held into such company.

The earliest valentines were nothing more than slips of paper, on which the names of both sexes were written, they were placed apart, the men drawing from the pile on which the women's names were endorsed, and they again making the lot of the fair fetched from the opposite heap. The names were then a number of days, some times inside the dwelling, or bodies, some times only on the sleeve, just as the fancy dictated or real lover intended to express his passion, and there is no doubt but that such a game began in jest, ended in earnest, and that by this means many of our forefathers won their fair brides.

Even in our own day, (and in the country the harmless custom still exists,) the first man the maiden sees on this auspicious morning was considered our valentine, and as much was hoped and the little trouble do the rustic lovers put themselves to occasionally, to meet the one on whom their choice has fallen, and had We can remember ourselves, in the days of youth, being fortunate enough to walk two miles in the snow and darkness, and waiting until the cottage door opened, to claim a cherry cheeked farmer's daughter for our valentine. Too poor, perhaps, to purchase the printed epistle with Cupid's aid, heart and doves, we presented the original, and tiernly saved both paper and postage. Gay, in his "Shepherd's Week," thus describes this old superstition:

"Last Valentine, the day when birds of kind,
Their pleasing loves with mutual chirpings find,
I early rose, just at the break of day,
Before the sun had closed the stars away.

A field I went, amid the morning dew,
To milk my kine, (for so should housewives do,)
Then first I spied, and the first swain we see,
In spite of fortune shall our true love be."

Another picture which we have seen of Valentine Day, would have looked well in the miniature painting of a Wilkie. The fond old mother with her spectacles off, reading the valentine her husband, who sulked as he listened attentively to every line, which said:

"The rose is red, the violet's blue,
Carnation's sweet, and so are you.
The ring is round and has no end,
So is my love to Mary, my friend.
First we met lots, and then we drew,
Kind fortune said it must be you.

While the pretty daughter, to whom these old fashioned lines were directed, sat with her hands clasped together on her knees, looking thoughtfully in the fire, and wondering to herself whether or not William really meant what he had written, and if he loved her truly as much as he pretended to do.

We have in our possession, framed and glazed, a valentine, which we sent to the dear old lady we well know more than half a century ago. It must have taken many hours to have cut out the hearts and diamonds in scissor work, and painted the border which surrounds the valentine like lace, the gentleman, who is standing under a tree and pointing to his ship. Rees Cluster and Lodgate make mention of Valentine Day, in the "Morning Star of Poetry," says:

"Dedicated to Saint Valentine,
I pen an ode, dear Mary, you to be mine—
Without proselyting my heart swerved,
Ground that day hundred years ago it was celebrated in England."

With us the day is marked by one single instance only, and that is the sending of valentines, of these are very valuable, consisting, in some instances, of a gold watch, a vase, a pearl, or a handsome bound book, alias letters, again, are scarcely worth the price of putting up, or price of postage. As all these modern days have their superstitious, could as well as old age look upon, and as a couple from the same and sphere of life, and, in fact, both present an amusement in participating in the fun, and, if they wish, and, we are almost tempted to say, follies.

LAWN FEES.

In the year 1891, the wages of a laboring man were less than four pence a day, while the price of a Bible was one hundred and eighty dollars. A common laborer in those days must work on industriously for thirteen long years, if he would possess a copy of the word of God! Now the earnings of a half priated day of the cost of a beautifully printed copy of the sacred oracles! What an illustration of the power of the press!

VALENTINE ANATOMY.

This popular phrase can be traced directly to Shakspeare—"Macbeth, Act I, Sc. 7.

"Venomous murders on Tarrops and curvets sit with thought impelling roots of Fiance, Our swiftness's cause from Syene, our artichokes from Sicily; letture from Cos, a same overspread rafts fennel, chalots, or eschalots, from Ascalon."

I have been reading on the subject, and was struck with the numerous ideas on colds, nerves and circulation, how may arise from a dinner. Will you have a dessert from nuts? The cherry and filbert are from Pontus, the chestnut from Media, the chestnut from Castana in Asia Minor, the peach and the walnut from Persia, the plum from Syria, the pomegranate from Cyprus, the quince from Cydon, the olive and fig from Greece, so are the best pears and peace, though also found wild in France, and even here. The spikenel is from Armenia.

TOO, OMNIS OR.

The origin of the "too" is referred by the Greeks to modesty and backbiness, proper, too to partake equally of humidity. They used to tell a pleasant story on the subject, for which we are indebted to Fenestrius. About thirty furlongs from the city of Sparta, Ivcurgus placed a statue of Modesty, for the purpose of perpetuating the following incident. "Ioarius having married his daughter to Ulysses, solicited his son-in law to fix his habitation in Sparta, and remain there with his wife, to which Ulysses would not consent. Frustrated in his application to the husband, he made the like request to his daughter, conjuring her not to abandon him; but, seeing her ready to depart with Ulysses for Ithaca, he redoubled his efforts to detail from following the chariot on the way. Ulysses, shocked at the desperate situation of his father-in-law, and wearied with his importunities, addressed his wife: "You can answer this request, if it pleases you to determine whether you will remain with your father at Sparta, or depart with your husband for Ithaca, you are mistress of the decision." The beautiful Penelope, finding herself in this dilemma, blushed, and, without making the least reply, drew the veil over her face, thereby intimating a denial of her father's request, and sunk in the arms of her husband. Ioarius, very sensibly affected by this further, and being desirous of transmitting it, concerned a statue of Modesty on the very spot where Penelope had thrown the veil over her face, that, after her, it might be a universal symbol of delicacy with the fair sex."

VERMILION EDICT.

This is an edict issued by the Emperor of China, written on vermilion colored paper. It is termed "Vermilion edict," from the fact that while other edicts can be considered, there is no appeal from this one. It is the "Mandate" which involving the whole nation in bloodshed.

Edicts, properly speaking, cannot exist in Great Britain, because the enacting of laws is lodged in the Parliament, and not in the King. China is, perhaps, the only country where such a wonderful instrument could be issued. Hence, the use of the term "Vermilion edict," being as despotic in its power as is the government that issued it.

VICE.

This was the buffoon in the old moralities, or morals, and other dramas, who was grotesquely dressed in a cap with asses ears, a long coat and a dagger of lath, and whose chief employment was to make sport with another buffoon called the Devil, leaping on his back and belaboring him with his dagger till he made him roar; called sometimes Iniquity.

The last vice, and had among them, one of their order, who was called Iniquity. In the old moralities, plays, in after years, he was denominated the Vice. Subsequently, in stage plays he was called the Fool, and when in the first species of the drama the puppet show succeeded, he was denominated Merry Andrew.

VIOLIN, OR RUBA.

In the primitive times, it was the custom to pass great part of the nights which precede certain festivals, in religious exercises; and these exercises, from being continued to the night, were called vigilar, vigils, or watchings.

VIRTUE OF GOLD.

"It is could by whose virtue life was implanted with the Tree of Life. The first entity or species of gold was called with the vegetable nature."—Tentilian.

As man is born in sin, the phrase "Gold is the root of all evil," is here fully sustained.

VOLUME.

The Romans commonly wrote only on one side of the paper or parchment, and always joined one sheet to the end of another till they finished what they had to write, and then rolled it up on a cylinder or staff; hence volumen, a volume or scroll, from the verb volvo, to roll.

(TO BE CONTINUED.)

SHOOTING THE BUFFALO.—The town of Griffin is the rendezvous of the Texas buffalo hunters. Men who make it a business pursue the animal as do sportsmen. They use the needle gun with telescopic sight, and the firing is done by one or two men only, who usually kill a drove of forty or fifty buffalo on one or two acres of ground. As soon as one is killed the whole herd, smelling the blood, circle around the dead body, snuffing and pawing. The hunters continue to shoot them until the last one bites the dust. As long as the men remain concealed and the buffalo do not get their scent the game is not frightened, for it pays no attention to the report of the weapon.

THE ORPHANS.

BY AUNT SUSAN.

[CONTINUED FROM LAST WEEK.]

Sara had been absent from home all the afternoon, and returned just as the bell was ringing for supper. She hurried to her chamber to lay aside her wraps, in order to make herself ready for the table, after which she proceeded, smiling, to the dining-room—taking her accustomed seat.

The board was brilliant with cut glass and shining silver, and a tempting array of delicately-prepared dishes was spread upon it. Sara had been walking, and had brought home a keen appetite. Therefore, while busily discussing her well-filled plate, she did not at first observe that an unwonted silence reigned over the assembled family. Looking around in surprise, she saw that the chair always occupied by Fritz was empty. A cold shudder crept over her, as she felt certain that something unpleasant must have happened to afid, unable to bear this suspense, she immediately asked why he was not at the table.

At the sound of Sara's voice, Mrs. Sanders busied herself with the coffee-urn, and Katie hung down her head over the sweetb

[illegible]

PHANTOMS,

OR A NIGHT MYSTERY.

[illegible]

LADIES' DEPARTMENT.

Fashion Notes, Queries and Fireside Chat.

[illegible]